A WEEKLY FAMILY AND RELIGIOUS JOURNAL.

NEW CENTURY NUMBER

A Creed in Verse:

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the Church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

TUB TRUTHS.

A DROP of ink will color a whole glass of water. It is an inch of yeast which makes a pan of bread rise, and a single cake of soap containing unabsorbed alkali can ruin a hundred times its cost in laces and fine embroidery. After all, is it wise to take such risks with common soap? Of course you can get along without Ivory Soap. So can a wagon without axle grease—but it goes hard.

Vol. xxxviii. St. Louis, Mo., Thursday, January 3, 1901. No. 1.

Principal Events of The Nineteenth Century

In choosing a brief list of events which shall be characterized as the most important of the century, it is not the part of wisdom to make categorical statements as to the relative importance of events in the spheres of politics, science, commerce, religion and literature. It will be seen that the last two are not represented in this list. There have been several religious movements, denominational, undenominational, interdenominational and anti-denominational which would certainly be placed by their respective advocates in any list of the world's great events. The founding of the Society of Christian Endeavor may yet prove to be an event of more far-reaching importance than the birth of any modern nation, and the beginning of the Y. M. C. A. movement may be of greater import than the opening of an interoceanic canal. It has been necessary to exclude from this list also literary events, though the writer would not be inclined to deny that there have been some books, the appearance of which was more epoch-making than the founding of a new empire. The following selection of the most important events may appear to countenance that trumpet-and-drum conception of history which Mr. Green so strongly deprecates, but after all these are the events which at present stand out like mountain peaks in a general view of the century.

Louisiana Purchase.

On April 30, 1803, the United States, under the leadership of Thomas Jefferson, purchased from France, then under the rule of Napoleon, the territory of Louisiana, extending from the Mississippi to the Pacific, for $15,000,000. Part of this domain had been acquired by France from Spain so recently that in some places, as at St. Louis, the Spanish flag was replaced by the French and that in turn by the American in a single day. This momentous act established a precedent for territorial expansion by purchase and gave to the United States access to a second ocean. The nineteenth century has witnessed the growth of national wealth and power consequent upon the development of the vast resources of the territory thus annexed. It remains for the twentieth century to develop for weal or woe the more remote consequences of the event, which, by giving us an outlook on the Pacific, opened the way to that contest between the Anglo-Saxon and the Slav in the far east which is to be the chief feature of the struggle of the world-powers in the next epoch.

Waterloo.

Since the Saracen invasion of western Europe was checked by Charles Martel at Poitiers in 732, there has not been a battle of more momentous consequences than the battle of Waterloo. The wave of Napoleonic conquest had swept over Europe from Lisbon to Moscow. Sweden was in his grasp and the pyramids of Egypt had witnessed his victories. England alone persistently refused to acknowledge his title as emperor. The Holy Roman Empire, which had long ago ceased to be more than a titular dignity and a venerable tradition, lost even its name, and all the continuity of European history seemed to be broken with the passing of that ancient institution. But Napoleon's difficulties multiplied with his successes. Not the retreat from Moscow alone but a multitude of less conspicuous but more fundamental causes, which were inseparable from the nature of his empire and the character of the nations which he had over-ridden, led to his abdication at Fontainebleau and his retirement to the island of Elba. While the Congress of Vienna was restoring the map of Europe, Napoleon suddenly appeared in France, summoned his veterans by the power of his imperial personality and the glory of a desperate cause and met the allied forces of Europe on the field of Waterloo. His defeat there meant that the days of universal empire are passed. It meant that the world would not permit one man to rule such an empire as had been ruled by Charlemagne and Charles V. It meant that the development of nationalities and national governments, a process which has been the fundamental and distinctive feature of modern history, could not be permanently interrupted by the efforts of one towering personality. It meant that against the trend of history the most potent conqueror can make head only for a brief season. Napoleon fell at Waterloo not only before the allied powers of Europe, but before the allied forces of historical continuity which he had defied.

Stevenson's Locomotive.

The application of steam power to the running of machinery is universally credited to Watts, whose first patent was dated 1767. The practical value of this discovery was so promptly appreciated that the factory which the inventor established turned out more than ten thousand stationary engines during his life. Watts, more fortunate than most inventors, acquired great wealth from his invention. The application of the principle of the steam engine to transportation seems not to have occurred to any one until Robert Stevenson, a Newcastle collier, constructed a rudimentary locomotive in 1815. Ten years later the first steam railway was put in operation between Stockton and Darlington in the coal district of eastern England. In 1835 a passenger railway was established between Liverpool and Manchester, a distance of about thirty miles. The directors offered a prize for the best locomotive. Of the four which submitted to the test, only Stevenson's "Rocket" went the required distance without breaking down. It is surprising to note that this little machine reached a speed of 29 miles an hour on some parts of its course, and the unqualified success of the steam engine as a locomotive power was universally recognized from this time. The "Rocket" is preserved on a pedestal in the vast and busy railway station of Newcastle, as a perpetual memorial of the inventive genius which has made the largest contribution to the material progress of the century.

The Morse Telegraph.

The invention of the electric telegraph in 1832 was a case apparently where a great discovery came easy. Samuel Morse was a middle-aged artist of some reputation, who had done good work both as painter and sculptor. While making an ocean voyage, a fellow-traveler returning from France described some experiments which he had seen illustrating the rapid movement of electricity. It occurred to Morse at once that the electric current might be made to carry a message at its own tremendous speed. Before the vessel landed he had devised a complete and workable apparatus and was at work on a code. Subsequent experiments entirely changed the instrument, but the principle remained. The United States has been indebted to the railway and the telegraph more than any other nation. They appeared just when our national life was beginning its westward expansion into vast new territories. The introduction of the railroad at this juncture prevented the construction of an extensive system of highways such as are found in all of the older countries which had expanded and developed at an earlier date, but enabled us to combine vast areas and vast natural resources with ease of intercommunication to a degree which had never before been realized.

Emancipation of Serfs.

While our republic was convulsed with civil war, growing largely out of the slavery question, the same spirit of liberty which had brought that question to the front in this country was making itself felt even in Russia, and there the advantages of a benevolent despotism were conspicuously exhibited. For many generations the Russian agricultural peasants, while not slaves, since they could not be sold from one estate to another, were attached to the soil as a part of the fixed equipment of each estate. The system had, to be sure, some advantages in that it guaranteed a livelihood to the peasants. But it had many disadvantages which made it a bar to the internal development of the nation.

Here the advantage of a benevolent despotism was conspicuously exhibited. With a stroke of his pen, Czar Alexander II liberated twenty million serfs, not casting them out into the world penniless with political rights but no means of self-support, but equitably dividing between the proprietors and the peasants the land which they had formerly tilled. The edict became effectual in February, 1862. It is safe to say that so great a work of liberation has never before or since been wrought in a day.

Emancipation Proclamation.

While it cannot be said that the question of the abolition of slavery was the proximate cause of the civil war, it is nevertheless true that the issues out of which the war sprang had their basis in differences of social, industrial and political conditions between the north and the south, at the bottom of all of which was the institution of slavery. This fact was not at first apparent, and even after the war had begun Lincoln declared that emancipation was no part of his program. The developments of the war showed the true importance of the slavery question in its bearing upon the preservation of the Union, and the President was too great to be afraid to change his mind. The Emancipation Proclamation, issued Jan. 1, 1863, was not only a charter of liberty to four million negro slaves but was the statement of a prime condition necessary for the perpetuation of our free institutions. It meant not only that the slave should henceforth be free, but that government of the people, for the people and by the people should not perish from the earth.

Suez Canal.

The completion, in 1867, of the canal through the Isthmus of Suez, connecting the Mediterranean with the Red Sea and thereby the Atlantic with the Indian Ocean, was an event of far-reaching importance in the history of commerce. It shortened the voyage from Liverpool to the ports of India, the East Indies, China and Japan by more than four thousand miles and redoubled the speed with which the forces of western civilization have pressed into the far East. The contest for supremacy in the Orient is, and in the twentieth century will be still more, between the Anglo-Saxons and the Slav. Russia's natural route to China lies across Siberia. England's is by water. The opening of the canal thirty years before the beginning of the trans-Siberian railway, gave to the Saxon an advantage which will be maintained, in spite of the greater directness of the Siberian railway, by the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal. The linking of Port Arthur and Vladivostock to Moscow and St. Petersburg by rail will be as important an event as the piercing of the Isthmus of Suez, and the opening of the Nicaraguan Canal will transcend both.

Victor Emmanuel In Rome.

The triumphal entry of King Victor Emmanuel into Rome, in 1870, marked the completion of the long development of Italian freedom and unity and the end of the Pope's rule as a temporal sovereign. For centuries Italy had been the battle-ground and the prize of half of the wars in Europe. Divided and oppressed, she retained a name which represented rather a geographical than a political fact. Italy was a peninsula, not a country. Austrian domination had succeeded the Napoleonic regime—and the name of Austria, from the days of William Tell and Gessler to the time of Metternich, has been the synonym of oppression. The rising of Mazzini and the Young Italy movement in 1831, and the campaigns of Garibaldi in 1860-61, were preparations for the final event—the political renaissance of reunited Italy. But in the center of the peninsula the Pope still ruled as a sovereign over the states of the Church, which, with many variations of boundary, had been the basis of the Pope's claim to a place in the family of monarchs since the Donation of Pepin in the middle of the eighth century. The entrance of the victorious army of Victor Emmanuel into Rome marked the end of this papal usurpation and completed the reunion of the Italian states.

The New German Empire.

The reconstruction of Germany by Napoleon in 1803 put an end to the Holy Roman Empire, which had now become a German empire, and grouped the vast number of principalities, which during the decline of the empire had been virtually independent states, into a few great duchies. This was the first step in the modernization of Germany. The old and merely nominal unity was destroyed and the way paved for a new and real unity. The Franco-Prussian war served as the occasion for the last step. In December, 1870, the North German Parliament offered to the king of Prussia the imperial crown of united Germany and in January of the following year Emperor William I was crowned in the palace of Versailles, the favorite residence of Louis XIV, near Paris, thus signalizing at once the crushing defeat of Germany's ancient enemy and the reunion of the German states in an empire which at once took its place among the foremost of the world-powers.

The Third French Republic.

The siege of Paris ended in capitulation ten days after the German Empire had been set up at Versailles. The Second French Empire had already fallen immediately after the battle of Sedan in September of the preceding year. A Commune was proclaimed, and riot and disorder prevailed among the frenzied people until Marshal MacMahon, fresh from the contest with Germany, besieged the city with government troops and put down the insurrection. The old Hotel de Bille, the Palace of the Tuileries and many other notable buildings were destroyed by the mob. In the Revolution of 1789 the fury of the mob was directed against the persons of its suspected enemies; the Commune of 1871 poured out the vials of its destructive wrath upon the historic buildings of Paris. The election of M. Thiers as President marked the beginning of the Third Republic, a government which, in spite of the extraordinary chaos out of which it arose, gives promise of being stable and permanent. The overcoming of such vast difficulties in internal reorganization and in the re-establishment of national prestige, has been a remarkable achievement. While America is frequently looked upon as a parvenu in the family of nations, it is to be borne in mind that the governments of France, Germany and Italy, in their present form, are but thirty years old.

Battle of Manila.

The victory of Admiral Dewey in Manila Bay, May 1, 1898, was an event of far-reaching importance for our government and for the European Powers. One eminent American, who characterized it as the most important event since the Battle of Waterloo, was corrected by another equally eminent gentleman who called it the most important event since the victory of Charles Martel over the Saracens. The entrance into Manila Bay meant the entrance of our government into the field of world politics. It did not mean necessarily that our methods must be those of the other nations which we have from time to time had occasion to disapprove; but that we shall undertake, in our own way, to do our part of the world's work outside of our own national boundaries. As a naval victory, it signifies that the United States must henceforth be a maritime power. As an entrance into the Pacific, it means that, whether or not we have any formal alliance or understanding with Great Britian, we shall join with her in the effort to introduce free Anglo-Saxon ideas and institutions and to prevent the introduction of despotic Slavic institutions in the lands which cluster about the Pacific Ocean, which in this new century is to be the center of the world's political and commercial interest.

To the surprise of the Chinese, as well as the representatives of the Powers, Emperor Kwang Su immediately agreed to the demands of the Powers as incorporated in the joint note, and has instructed his commissioners, Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching, to sign the agreement at once, only cautioning them to obtain, if possible, some limitation on the number of troops which may be kept in Pekin as legation guards and the number of posts between Pekin and the sea which may be held by the Powers. Li Hung Chang's health is so bad that he will probably have to retire from his position on the peace commission. It is said that the Chinese Minister at Washington discredits the report that the terms have been accepted. Reports that come from China, notably those of Dr. Morrison, Pekin correspondent of the London Times, accuse the German troops of looting continually and going outside of the boundaries to which Count von Waldersee has been assigned.

The Boer invasion of Cape Colony has been checked and may be said to have turned out a failure, except for the purpose of creating a temporary scare. I an attack on the British garrrison at Helvetia the Boers killed and wounded nearly one hundred men and took two hundred prisoners, but did not attempt to hold the post. De Wet is still at large. Boer forces have so far cut the lines leading to Kimberley that the town is practically isolated.

In an article in the North American Review for January under the title "The Food of the Army during the Spanish War," Ex-Secretary of War Alger stirs up the "embalmed beef" scandal by way of clearing himself against the charges which were made against him at the time of the official inquiry. He defends General Eagan who was suspended from his office for uugentlemanly language in regard to General Miles, and makes a severe, though unparliamentary, attack upon General Miles.

Retrospective and Prospective.

In our desire to prognosticate the course of things in the twentieth century, we shall find no safer data on which to base our conclusions than the unmistakable trend of things throughout the centuries of the Christian era. It was Patrick Henry who said in his great speech which stirred the heart of the colonists, that he knew of no way of judging the future but by the past, and that he had no lamp by which his feet could be guided except the lamp of experience. Whether this be our only means of judging of the future or not, it is certainly the most reliable. Glancing back in brief retrospect, let us look at a few of the unmistakable tendencies in Christian history with the view of seeing what they indicate as to the developments of the future. We shall aim to mention only those about which there can be no reasonable dispute.

1. The assertion of individual rights growing out of the doctrine of human equality and human brotherhood as against the tyranny of kings and of ecclesiastical hierarchy is so marked a feature of the past, and especially of the later centuries, as to rise like a mountain chain in the historical landscape. The influence of this tendency in governments and in religion has been most marked and must continue to be in the future. It was this that made the Reformation of the sixteenth century, as well as those of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, possible. It is this growing consciousness of human rights that has established on these shores a republican form of government and that has made more democratic and less autocratic every government on earth. It is but reasonable to infer that this tendency, springing as it does from fundamental causes, will continue to exert its influence until in religion every man shall be entirely free to form his own convictions of his duty to God without interference from any ecclesiastical authority. This seems to us to mean that all those ecclesiastical organizations whose hierarchies lord it over God's heritage, and who assume the right of coming between the conscience of the people and God, must either modify their whole spirit and method or become a waning power, whose influence will be exerted only over the most ignorant classes of people. It follows, too, that such tyrants as the Sultan of Turkey will be overthrown and new governments devised, and that other empires retaining more or less of the autocratic principles are to be greatly modified. We may safely anticipate an expansion throughont the twentieth century of civil and religious liberty.

2. No one will deny that there has been an increasingly higher ethical standard during the past centuries in politics and religion and in social and industrial life. One has but to compare the moral standard in all these spheres of life in the Roman Empire at the birth of Christianity with the standards now recognized in different countries, to see that there has been, if not a steady and unbroken progress, which is rarely ever the case, yet on the whole a decided advance in this respect. Politics once meant the whims and fancies of corrupt and tyrannous kings and emperors, while religion was made to pander to human lust, to human ambition and human greed, while in the world of industry the mass of people were slaves, having no special rights which the few wealthy and noble were bound to respect. The centuries under Christian influence have witnessed revolt after revolt against these abuses, resulting in the elevation of the standard of morals in every sphere of life. Since there is yet great need for progress in the same direction, who can doubt but that the twentieth century will witness a steady advancement along the same line? The practices of many professed Christians to-day which do not apparently disturb the consciences of the perpetrators or their victims, will seem intolerable in the light of that higher ethical standard which will be raised by the middle of the twentieth century. Many of our industrial methods are sure to give way to others more humane, not to say more Christian. Sweat shops, reeking tenement houses, slum districts, will be looked back upon with amazement and with a feeling of indignation from the heights of the closing decades of the twentieth century.

3. The substitution of the inductive method of reasoning from facts to conclusions for the former method of searching for proof of previously accepted theories and making the facts conform to these theories, is one of the great steps forward during the last few centuries. The application of this method of reasoning has brought about a revolution in many fields of thought, but its full influence is not yet felt. It is so manifestly just, however, that there is no reason to doubt but that the twentieth century will witness a more universal introduction of this method into all the realms of human thinking. Religion, we regret to say, while it has profited greatly from the inductive method, is suffering most, perhaps, for lack of a fuller application of the principle. Many theories of inspiration and of revelation, as well as many systems of theology, will have to either go by the board or be greatly revolutionized by the application of the inductive method. It will be interesting for those who live long enough to witness both the destructive and constructive influence of this method in the realm of theology during the century which has just begun.

4. Another marked tendency, especially within the latter part of the nineteenth century, has been in the direction of applying religion in a practical way to the affairs of this life. The other-worldliness of religion in the past has done much to divorce it from human interest. The tendency in these later years to regard the religion of Christ as intended to fit men for this life as well as to get them ready for the next, seems quite in harmony with Christ's own thought and is bound in the nature of things to become the controlling and permanent view of Christianity. It is to the regnancy of this view that we are to look for those reforms which have been long waiting for an aroused Christian conscience and an awakened church.

5. Along with the foregoing is the increasing recognition of religion as meeting not only a legitimate demand of human nature, but as being essential to its normal development. In other words, man is now recognized as a religious being; that is, that religion is not something foreign to his nature, but demanded by his nature in order to his truest and best development. There will be no more attempts in the twentieth century to extirpate religion. That can only be done by extirpating human nature and especially the noblest and highest part of it. The increasing recognition of the naturalness of religion and of its essential place in human culture, is bound to have a modifying influence upon present educational methods as well as upon many of our religious theories.

6. Finally, nothing has been more manifest during the last quarter of the nineteenth century than the decrease of party spirit among Christians, and the increasing sentiment in favor of Christian unity and co-operation in various lines of work. When we examine what reasons underlie and what vast motives influence this feeling, we cannot regard it as a temporary sentiment, but rather as a great cosmic movement in the church toward that ideal which our Lord had in view in establishing it. We believe the twentieth century will witness great progress in the direction of the fulfillment of Christ's prayer for unity. Along with this feeling of unity, and as indicating the direction of its growth, is the tendency to exalt Christ above all credal statements and to regard Him as the one only and sufficient foundation of the church universal. Already plans are being devised and in some places executed for church federation, and some method will be found by which the churches, without sacrificing their consciences or freedom of utterance, may work together and manifest their unity in advancing human welfare. And this is likely to lead to that closer and more perfect unity into which the church is yet to come.

These are some of the lines of progress along which the church is to move during the twentieth century, if we may base our conjectures on the facts of the past. In any event it is assuring and comforting to know that it is ours to do the duty which God makes manifest to us, and that He will guide the course of the world's progress to the accomplishment of His own great and gracious purposes.

On Self-Culture.

By the time this paper reaches the gentle reader, the new year and the new century will be three days old—or perhaps four. By that time the first set of new resolutions, made spasmodically and on the impulse of a unique moment, will be hopelessly broken into fragments too small to be worth preserving and the field will be clear for a new set. To say that it is not worth while to wait until next New Year's day before replacing the shattered resolutions with new ones would be too platitudinous to be interesting. Whether or not a year seems long depends very much upon one's age, but at any rate it is long enough to give room for the doing of a good many things. Accomplishment is, after all, more a matter of speed than time. While this second and more permanent series of resolutions is being made, it is safe to hope that there will be many, both young and old, who will find a place in their list for a resolution to make some systematic effort for self-culture.

"Self-Culture" is, to be sure, a tautological expression, for all culture is self-culture. You can cultivate a field, but you cannot cultivate a man. A man has to cultivate himself. But the term self-culture is all right if taken in its ordinary meaning, indicating culture attained by the use of those means which can be employed individually or without the mediation of those organizations, such as schools and universities, which have for their object not to thrust culture upon the people, but to guide them in the selection of those instruments whereby they can attain culture for themselves.

One chief advantage of this institutional culture, as distinguished from self-culture in the narrower sense, is that it affords a means, more or less artificial perhaps, but generally effective, of sti mulating resolution. When one studies in a class, it is easier to go on than to drop out and the natural inertia of human nature is thereby ingeniously enlisted on the side of perseverance. But when one begins a course of systematic study alone, it is, alas! so much easier at every point to stop than to go on. The interest flags for a day, or the course leads through a bit of unattractive desert. There may be much pleasant land beyond, but this traveler, travelling with no guide, does not know it. And at this point many fall by the wayside and thorns of indifference spring up and choke them.

The natural safeguard against this danger is to begin at the point where your interest lies and contrive always to be interested in what you study and to retain an interest in what you have studied. There was once a bright young man who, by dint of much reading in the newspapers about the Paris Exposition, acquired what seemed to him to be a comprehensive and abiding interest in all things pertaining to Paris and France. He therefore planned a course of systematic study in French history, and, being animated by a commendable desire for thoroughness, he began back at the time of Clovis. By the time he had worked his way down through the annals of the Franks and Burgundians and the rest of the barbarians of that period to the time of Charlemagne, he was sick of French history and quit without ever coming in sight of any of those things in which he had been interested when he began the study.

The teaching of this fable is that if you are interested in any subject, start right there where your interest is. The young man in question should have begun with the magazine articles about the Exposition and with descriptive books about present-day Paris. His interest then would doubtless have led him back into the earlier history and, if he missed the advantage of studying everything in chronological order, he would at least have secured the much greater advantage of having it all alive to him. If you have acquired through Tennyson an interest in English poetry and wish to study its development, it will be safer to begin with Tennyson and go back than to begin with Beowolf and come down. If the frescoes in the Boston Public Library have aroused an interest in the history of art, it is better to begin with the study of the works of contemporary artists than to start back with the Byzantines.

The greatest difficulty in the way of self-culture is the difficulty of keeping at it. Being deprived of the external stimulus of class-room rivalry and professorial exhortation, one must depend upon the fundamental motive—interest in the subject. Every other consideration must therefore, if necessary, be sacrificed to this. Chronological seqence and scientific completeness are of secondary importance. Again, let it be repeated, begin with the subject-matter of your most immediate interest. There is nothing so dangerous for self-culture as a running start through regions that are logically connected with the subject but in themselves dull.

The Study of the Pioneers.

Whenever any enterprise or movement has succeeded, the study of its genesis and of the men who had to do with its inauguration, becomes a matter of historic interest. The reformation of the nineteenth century has attained a momentum and dimensions which have attracted the attention of thoughtful people everywhere. It is not surprising, therefore, that we witness at the present time a growing interest in the men who had to do with its earlier history, and who make up a large part of that history. The reasons which underlie this revival of interest in the study of the lives of the pioneers of this movement are the following:

1. The history of any religious movement is best understood as it is seen incarnated in the lives and teachings of its earliest promoters. In such men one sees not the abstract doctrine merely, but the very life and spirit of the movement itself.

2. This is pre-eminently true of the men who, under God, won the earliest successes for this plea for a return to the Christianity of Christ. They were filled with such a sense of the value of the work they were doing and of the cause they were pleading, that they lost sight of all such considerations as compensation for their labors, or personal popularity, or ease. All these they were willing and glad to sacrifice on the altar of a religious movement which they believed to hold within it the best hope for a triumphant Christianity. In reading their lives one is conscious of the presence within them of a zeal and of an indomitable courage, which in every age of the world have made heroes and heroines for Christ.

3. There is at the beginning of every reformation a spirit of freedom from mere tradition and established usage which is most refreshing and helpful, and to which we need to return often to avoid that slavery to custom and opinion which results in stagnation and decay. The first period of any religious reformation is the free, creative period, when hoary errors are discarded and revered opinions disregarded and there is a return to original sources of authority. A re-study of the lives of the men of such a period is necessary to keep alive the spirit of freedom and of progress.

4. There is always such a relation between the present and the past that we never fully understand what is until we have become acquainted with what has been. We doubt if it is possible for any one without a knowledge of the conditions and circumstances under which our own movement began and was carried forward in its earlier history, as illustrated in the lives of its earliest advocates, to have a perfect understanding of its purposes, principles and spirit.

5. The present generation can never realize their debt of obligation to the early reformers who lived and wrought in the first quarter of the present century, until they have acquainted themselves with the struggles and sacrifices of their lives for the cause they loved. It can hardly fail, too, to stir up those of us who live to-day to dare and suffer more for the extension of Christ's kingdom, to read the lives of the heroic men to whom we are so much indebted for the progress we have made.

6. Finally, there comes a conviction into the mind as we study the lives of these pioneers, that God was with them and gave them success against great odds, and we instinctively feel that if he was with them he will be with us in fighting the same battles and in carrying forward the same principles, and so we are inspired with an all-conquering faith and hope in the success of the work in which we are engaged.

By all means, therefore, let there be a widespread revival of the study of the lives of the pioneers of this movement, and out of it there will be sure to come an increase of devotion to the cause which they loved so well, and for which they sacrificed so much.

Hour of Prayer.

An Inward Look.

TEXT: "Search me, O God, and know my heart:
Try me, and know my thoughts:
And see if there be any way of wickedness in me,
And lead me in the way everlasting" (Psa. 139:23-24).

An inward look is quite as essential as a forward look. Indeed, there can be no true outward looking that is not preceded by an inward look. In other words, we must know ourselves before we can understand our true relation to God and to the world about us. Self-examination is, therefore, a duty we owe to ourselves and to others.

A Noble Ambition.

The Psalmist, in the text cited above, appeals to God to search him and to know his heart; to penetrate into his very secret thoughts and see if there were any way of wickedness in him. His supreme ambition was to be right with God. So far as he knew he had cleansed himself from evil ways, but lest there might be some lingering thought, or purpose, or desire within him, that was not right, he desired God to search him. No one can make this prayer who is not conscious of a supreme desire to be all that God would have him be, and to do all that God would have him do. But whoever cherishes this desire, cherishes the noblest ambition which it is possible for mortals to have. The prayer is like that of the nineteenth Psalm: "Cleanse thou me from hidden faults." It did not satisfy the Psalmist to be right in his own estimation; he wanted to be right in the sight of God and this should be the aspiration of every one of us.

The Sense of God's Presence.

We can imagine no greater deterrent from evil and no greater stimulus to right-doing, aside from the love of Christ constraining us, than the consciousness of God's presence. Whoever realizes, as the Psalmist did, that God searches us and knows us; that He knows our down-sitting and up-rising; that He understands our thoughts afar off; that He searches out our paths and our couches and is acquainted with all our ways; that He knows every word on our tongue (Psa. 139:1-4), is not likely to live a vain and frivolous life, much less a life of wickedness and open rebellion against God. To cultivate the sense of God's presence is one of the great needs of the hour, as it is one of the chief means of spiritual growth. The moral heroes in all ages have been men who had a realizing sense of God's presence.

God's Thoughts Revealed.

To enable us to come to the knowledge of God and of His will concerning us, God has manifested Himself in His word. He has revealed His character and His will concerning us in human speech and especially in His own divine Son in human form. Concerning God's thought thus revealed, the author of the Hebrew letter says: "For the word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart" (Heb. 4: 12). Do we want to slay the evil within us? Let us admit the word of God with its keen blade of truth, which is able to put to flight the whole brood of evil thoughts and purposes which may be nesting in our hearts. Would we have a quick moral sense by which to discern the good from the evil? Let us admit the word of God, which, in the keenness of its penetration, divides between soul and spirit, joints and marrow, and is quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart. What statement could more emphasize the supreme value of acquainting ourselves with God's thoughts as they are revealed in His word and especially in the Word "which became flesh and dwelt among us" (John 1: 14).

Proving Ourselves.

Another one of the means which God has given us for proving or testing ourselves is the Lord's Supper. Concerning the right manner of approaching this sacred ordinance, the apostle Paul says: "But let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of the bread and drink of the cup" (1 Cor. 11: 28). What place and what time are more favorable for sincere self-examination and self-proving than in the presence of the Lord's table on the Lord's day? Perhaps we have not sufficiently thought of this ordinance as God's word, that is, God's thought embodied in an institution which is able to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart. But is it not so? Why is it we seem to realize our moral unworthiness more in the presence of these speaking symbols than almost anywhere else?

Why Examine Ourselves?

Our self-examination must not be morbid. It should be an honest testing of our spiritual condition as to whether we are right before God. As Paul states it: "Try your own selves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves" (2 Cor. 5: 8). The end of self-examination, then, is to know whether we be in the faith. But to be in the faith in Paul's thought was to be in loving and loyal relations with Jesus Christ. It includes the state of the heart and of the life as well as that of the intellect. No one in Scripture language is deemed to be in the faith whose life is marked by disobedience to Christ. The phrase goes a great deal deeper into the essentials of our being than many have been accustomed to think, and it will be a good thing for us if we may be startled out of our religious indifference to an honest, thorough probing, with the aid of God's word, into our hearts and lives, to see whether or not we be in the faith. May the examination be such as to lead us to raise a higher standard of Christian living for ourselves.

Prayer.

O Thou Searcher of all hearts, who dwellest in light unapproachable and in whom there is no darkness, wilt Thou be pleased to cause Thy light to shine into our hearts that we may truly know ourselves in our relations to Thee and to one another. If our Christian life has been only nominal; if we have a name to live while our hearts are estranged from thee; if while professing to be followers of Christ we be followers of the world instead, do Thou grant us in Thy great mercy to realize our true condition before it is too late. Save us, we beseech Thee, from insincerity and from professing more than we are honestly trying to live. And this we ask in Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

The solemn midnight hour approaches. The clock in the church tower, which is visible from my study window, will soon strike twelve. It will be the knell of the dying century. It will be the knell also of how many faded dreams and vanished hopes, blasted theories, dark superstitions and foul wrongs. This transition from one century to another is solemnly impressive. Does nature know? Her mood seems to be in sympathy with the hour. The moon, not yet in her full-orbed splendor, and the trembling stars look down with their bright faces upon this revolving orb as if conscious that it was marking off a distinct cycle of time. How long a century seems to us! And yet with God, who dwells in eternity, and with whom Alps and Andes come and go like rainbows, how short a period it is! With Him a thousand years is as a day. In His sight the generations of men appear and depart like successive waves that beat on the shore. And yet in their little day men think they have acquired wisdom and profundity, and sometimes they even venture to question the ways of the Almighty! Nothing is better calculated to fill one with the sense of humility than the contemplation of the brevity of his life here on earth, and the utter impossibility of his doing more than learning the alphabet of that knowledge which is infinite.

But hark! The bell is tolling the midnight hour. We are on the verge of two centuries. The old one is departing rapidly towards the setting sun, and lo! from the east the new is coming and we are in the twentieth century. There has been no jar in nature. Stars move as of old in their appointed courses and the unfinished moon, like the many unfinished tasks of civilization, seems to argue the continuation of time and of the present order until the world has reached its true goal. It is sometimes said that the earth is old and in its decrepitude. On the contrary it seems to us to be yet in its youth, not having yet attained its majority. It must be that the present material order will continue until the great principles of love and righteousness which lie at the heart of things have wrought out a fairer civilization than the world has yet seen.

Good-bye, old century, good-bye. You did good service in your day, and we were proud of you and boasted much of your progress. But you are a dead century now, and we can only try to hold you in loving remembrance. Welcome, new century. We are glad you have arrived. We have been looking for you. We always knew you would be a fairer, nobler century than your predecessor. We expect much of you. It is ours to welcome your birth; it will be yours to witness our departure. You will outlive all of us, and lead the world on to nobler heights than it has ever attained before. So we believe. Therefore we bid you welcome.

We greet our readers this week in a new dress, in a new year and in a new century. But, after all, it is the same old CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that did what it could to help the world along toward the millennium during the preceding century, and this is the same old "Easy Chair" in which we have had so many pleasant chats with our readers in the days gone by. The dress, it is true, does not make the man or the newspaper, but it does have something to do in declaring the character of the man or the newspaper. The personal identity of a man or a journal does not inhere in the body, but in the spirit. Science used to tell us that the human body changes once in seven years, and now it affirms a more frequent change; but the human personality continues. Our present large edition of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST makes it necessary to change its body, that is to say its type, once every year, and we have frequently changed its form, and may do so again. But through all these changes of type and form the journalistic identity is preserved —the identity of spirit, of principles and of aim.

It would be a happy thing if the new century meant a new world, made up of new men and women, dominated by the new life; in other words, "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." But it does not mean so much as that. Crossing the century line will work no changes in character in and of itself. It may, however, and let us hope that it will, prove to be the occasion of many new lives. Every new year offers a fresh incentive for new resolutions and for new efforts at higher living. But this beginning of a new century ought to make an appeal to the dullest soul to rise and shake off its moral lethargy and seek to be something nobler and truer than it has been before.

"If above himself
He hath not power to erect himself
How poor a thing is man?"

It is the glory of man that he does have such self-determining power within him. It is his shame that he does not use it always to raise himself out of the vulgar and commonplace, the sensual and the immoral, into a noble and true manhood where he may walk with the elect spirits of earth and even hold communion with God. Why is it that we content ourselves to dwell in the dungeons we ourselves have formed of our own carnality when we might escape our prison gloom and walk on the sun-lit heights with angels for our ministering spirits? One reason doubtless is that men thus imprisoned do not realize that One has come to open the prison doors and to set the captive free, and that his puissant hand is reached out to us to help us out of our degradation and thraldom into the largeness and the liberty of the children of God. The "Easy Chair" can wish nothing better for its readers than that the new century may bring to them a new sense of God's infinite goodness, of the essential dignity of human life, of the reality of Christ's comradeship and helpfulness to every struggling mortal, and so enable them to enter more largely into that newness of life in Christ Jesus which is the true end of all human struggle and divine discipline.

AT THE GATES of THE NEW CENTURY

By Amory H. Bradford, D. D., author of "The Age of Faith," etc.

Wonder and Prophecy.

The least sentimental are inclined to prophesy as they pass from the old century to the new. The grand divisions of time are singularly impressive, for, usually, they mark also grand divisions of history. "The Awe of the New Century" is a profound reality to thoughtful souls. It is easier to wonder than to predict. The progress of the last decades has been so swift and varied that expectancy grows apace. Will the discoveries of the next one hundred years equal those of the past? Will the advances in physical development, in industry, in knowledge of the world, in exploration of new forces, be as marvelous? One hundred years ago there were no railroads, no telegraphs, no telephones. Of "the electric age" there was no dream. There were neither steamers on the ocean nor railways on the land. Africa was all a dark continent, and most of Asia was composed of hermit nations. The missionary movement was practically unknown. Is the future to witness still stranger transformations? If so, what force will furnish our light? Shall we travel over the earth or through the air? Will distance offer any barrier to speech or to sight? Will the nations be separated as now, or will Tennyson's dream of "a federation of the world" have become reality? Questions like these multiply as we stand "At the Gates of the New Century." Prophecy may be idle, but few can doubt that the discoveries and changes of the Twentieth Century will far surpass those of the Nineteenth.

An Age of Faith.

We cannot help wondering in what forms Christians will confess their faith one hundred years from now. As I study the ecclesiastical world I do not find that the essential faith of the church is different from what it was two generations ago. Men still know that they are sinners; and they believe in God, in his power and purpose to save, in the revelation in Jesus Christ and in the life everlasting.

But when we come to forms of expression there is little harmony. The Presbyterian Church is considering whether it shall revise its old creed or have a new one, and many of those who vote against the new do so simply because they think that it would not be radically different from the old. The Anglican Church still uses the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, but publicly boasts that it is an inclusive church. That this is an age of faith few doubt who know the facts, but in what words the Christian belief will be formulated is an open question. Will there be more unity in creedal expression in 1950 than now? Will new facts have to be included in our articles of belief? Are we growing toward unity of religious opinions, or toward greater diversity? I do not presume to answer, for prophecy is unprofitable business, but I cannot help asking these questions as I stand before "The Gates of the New Century."

What of the Church?

In these days the church as an institution is the subject of widespread criticism. So great and good a man as the late Professor Bruce said that he was confident of the growth and perpetuity of the kingdom, but he had grave doubts concerning the church. Will the power of the church as a means for advancing the kingdom wax or wane? Has it seen its best days, and must it give place to other institutions, or is it to be purified and made worthy to be called the Bride of Christ? Some see nothing before the church but a stormy sea, while others believe that, like the ship of old, it carries the Master who will still the winds and the waves. In the past emphasis has been placed on institutions and liturgies rather than upon the power of living men. It has been felt that the church was the vestibule to heaven, and that no one could get into the latter except by way of the former. Its assemblies and councils have often practically assumed to have the power of the keys. Will this continue? Will the growth of the future be toward corporate action, or toward the development of individual initiative under the leadership of the Spirit? Not a few are confident that the days of institutionalism are numbered, and that the days of the Spirit are near at hand. I dare not predict, but as I stand "At the Gates of the New Century" I wonder what would be disclosed if they were to be opened.

Pulpit or Press?

With the growth of the printing press, and especially with the advent of newspapers and periodicals, has come the conviction that the power of the pulpit is failing, that the church may be a very good place for worship, but that when men desire instruction they can be better satisfied by what they may read than what they can hear. Is that contention true? I do not believe that there ever was a time in which a man with a real message commanded a more thoughtful hearing. The people are more intelligent, and therefore more critical. They detect shams more easily. They have no patience with commonplaces. Mere professionalism they abhor. The sphere of the minister is smaller than formerly. He is no longer expected to be the village encyclopedia; but, on the other hand, men of vision, moral earnestness, real ability and spiritual manhood find the pulpit still a throne of power. But which way is the current moving? Is the tide lifting the pulpit to a higher place, or is it slowly drawing it out to be drowned in the deep sea? Fifty years from now what will be its place in the life of the people? Will the unseen be brought nearer, or will it still, as now, need an interpreter? Will the accepted interpreter be a man trained for that special work, or will he be a scientist whose time is given to expounding and enforcing truths which are written in the universe and the human soul as well as in the Bible?

Twentieth Century Missions.

And what about the evangelization of the world? Will missions extend their influence, or will they have done their work, and instead of them shall we have native Christians in many lands preaching the Gospel in their own language and to their own people? The movement of events in the last few years has been swiftly in that direction. The people of one nation will not long be dependent on those of another for a knowledge of the Gospel and the interpretation of moral ideals. Shall we for many years continue sending missionaries to distant lands? Enthusiastic young men are talking about the evangelization of the world in one generation. Is that mere enthusiasm, or has it a basis of reality? When the twentieth century has reached its noon, will such scenes as have been witnessed in China and in Armenia be possible? or will they be remembered only as now we think of the enormities of the Middle Ages? Will the missionary crusade come to an end, or will it advance as the years pass?

The New Unity.

That conditions are changing every one can see. The nations are getting closer together; Chinese walls are being broken down; the ocean has become but a ferry; mountains are no longer dreaded by engineers. The nations are nearer to each other now than the states of this Union were one hundred years ago. Are these changes prophetic of larger ones in the kingdom of God? We must leave that question unanswered, but faith catches hints of a time when the world will actually be evangelized; when the best aspirations and ideals will find free course among all the peoples, and when the religion of truth, righteousness and love will need no special messengers, but be the common property of every nation.

As we stand "At the Gates of the New Century" and ask what lies hidden in the midst of the years, a deep and reverent awe takes possession of our souls. We may not be satisfied with any audible response to our inquiries, but we may be assured that because God is in his world his purposes cannot long be hindered. Truth, righteousness and love are sure to prevail, and it makes little difference what part specific institutions or individual men may have in the glory of the consummation, since the end toward which all things move is not the glorification of institutions or individuals, but the triumph of the kingdom.

Montclair, N. J.

The World is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little we see in Nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon.
This Sea that bares her bosom to the moon,
The winds that will be howling at all hours
And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers,
For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn,—
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn.
—Wordsworth.

There is one mind common to all individual men. He that is once admitted to the right of reason is made a freeman of the whole estate. What Plato has thought, he may think; what a saint has felt, he may feel; what at any time has befallen any man, he can understand. Of the works of this mind, history is the record.—Emerson.

How to Study the Gospel Narratives.*

A. M. Chamberlain.

In attempting to outline a method of study for the four Gospels two things press upon the attention. Of all the Bible records these obtain the most loving attachment of the followers of Christ. They breathe forth the spirit of his matchless life. At the same time, from the fourfold record, their mastery in any degree becomes the most difficult phase of Bible study. Our work must aim at two things, first, some conception of the life of Jesus as a whole, and this involves acceptance of some scheme of gospel harmony; second, and this perhaps in importance stands first, some discriminating knowledge of the four records in their distinctive features. This last is the difficult phase of the study of the gospel narratives.

As to the first, a general survey of some harmony of the Gospels, such as is found among the "helps" of the various editions of "Teachers' Bibles" will be necessary. The important points to be noted are, the authorities for the birth and early life of Jesus, the duration of his ministry, the natural subdivisions, and, in a broad way, which of the Gospels gives the record of each. Any critical study of "harmony" may now well be left to a later time. In entering upon a discriminating study of the separate Gospels, it is assumed that the student is already familiar with the incidents and stories of the records. If this is not the case, then the first thing to do is to read the four Gospels through carefully several times until the mention of any miracle, discourse, or parable, or any incident in the record will recall at least a broad outline of the matter referred to. In general, not much of this work will be required, for the methods of study pursued in our Sunday-schools suffice to give just about this measure of knowledge of the Gospels.

To begin the work of gaining a discriminative knowledge of the contents of the various Gospels, take a note book and propose the following investigations:

1. What is the comparative length of the four Gospels? Tabulate your answer, remembering that the length is to be counted by the pages covered and not by the number of chapters. Subjoin, however, the number of chapters in each.

2. What is the first thing in the life of Jesus recorded in each of the four Gospels? Tabulate your answer.

3. What is the number and distribution of the records of miracles? Tabulate your answer as follows:

Miracles.	Number.	Unrepeated
Total in Gospels	——	——
Recorded in Matthew	——	——
" " Mark	——	——
" " Luke	——	——
" " John	——	——

Follow this with lists of the unrepeated miracles of each Gospel.

4. What is the number and distribution of the records of parables? Tabulate the result of your investigations as in the case of miracles.

5. What is the number and distribution of the discourses of Jesus other than parables recorded in the Gospels? Tabulate as in other cases, using a few catch words for each in making up the separate lists.

*Supplementary reading in the Bethany C. E. Reading Course.

It will result from these combined investigations that you will see that the Gospel of Mark contains very little matter which is not repeated somewhere in the other records. Attentive study and repetition of the facts you have discovered will certainly begin to differentiate the four Gospels one from the other in your minds, but there remains the task of learning where to look for at least one record of many of the facts of the Gospels. So difficult is this considered by the average student that the absence of any positive knowledge of this character after years of pretended study is one of the crying evils of our methods of Bible study. With proper method, as I hope to prove, the task is by no means so difficult as is commonly supposed.

You will now set out to learn the location of about seventy-five items in the gospel records. As the harmonies of the Gospels usually list only about two hundred and fifty, this means the practical location of one-third of the incidents in the whole record. The human mind is guided in its thought processes, including acts of memory, quite largely by laws of association of ideas. By taking advantage of these we shall be able by a few hours' effort to add the mass of facts referred to above permanently to our store of biblical knowledge. To make the matter as simple as possible we shall learn to associate one or two incidents with each of the chapters of Matthew, Luke and John, repeating no incident. Association of the other contents of each chapter with those thus fixed will enable those who so desire in a short time to master the contents of the three Gospels indicated. The Gospel of Mark is ignored in this scheme because of the fact that it has practically no unique records.

We shall base our scheme of memorizing locations on the ability to give title to the twenty-one chapters of John. This, because the chapters of John contain so many long discourses that they are almost topical in character. Let each one in attempting the mastery of this mass of knowledge concerning the Gospels, draft it in the form of a chart for ready reference. Take a large sheet of paper and divide it lengthwise into three equal columns. Over the center division write John, over the left-hand division, Matthew, and over the one on the right, Luke. Draw cross lines about two writing spaces apart until you have twenty-eight vertical divisions. This will occupy two foolscap pages. Number the divisions in each section from one to twenty-eight. Beginning with the column headed "John" write down titles to the various chapters as follows: 1. Nature of Christ. "In the beginning was the word." 2. Christ's First Miracle. 3. Christ and Nicodemus. 4. Christ Preaches to the Woman of Samaria. 5. Heals Impotent Man at Pool of Bethesda. 6. Feeds the Five Thousand. 7. Christ's Authority, The Sabbath Question. 8. The Adulteress, Light and Truth. 9. Heals Man Born Blind. 10. The Good Shepherd. 11. Lazarus' Tomb Opened. 12. The Anointing in Bethany. Triumphal Entry. 13. The Last Supper. 14. "Let not your heart be troubled." The Many Mansions. 15. The Vine and The Branches. 16. The Comforter. 17. Christ's Prayer for the Unity of His Followers. 18. Christ Humbles himself in Gethsemane. 19. Christ's Trial and Crucifixion. 20. Christ Raised Up. 21. Second Great Draught of Fishes.

Before going further this list must be thoroughly mastered, and even here we may begin the use of the mnemonic links of association and contrast which are to assist us in the completion of our task. Let it be understood that this is no piece of mental trick work, but is the studied and deliberate use of laws of "memory-pinning" which are more or less utilized involuntarily by all. Let it be further stated that the associations or contrasts upon which the fixing of memories is made to depend need not be severely logical. Often seemingly trivial, they yet serve their purpose in keeping under control the knowledge we wish to utilize.

For instance, it happens in the foregoing list that the question of Christ's right to heal on the Sabbath (seventh day) occurs in the seventh chapter. The Last Supper (where thirteen sat at table) occurs in the thirteenth chapter. Another case quite as good is the feeding of the Five Thousand, not in the fifth where the association would be complete, but in the sixth, the next number following. This illustrates the fact that dissociation or contrast if carefully and constantly noted serves quite as well as the closest association in fixing our memories. We have then at the outset our list of twenty-one chapters divided into three not very unequal groups, and with these fixed points to rest upon, the mastery of the entire series will be found a comparatively easy matter.

When these are well mastered, not before, we will proceed to build upon them a distinctive memory for each of the corresponding chapters of Luke and Matthew. Our points of memory in these chapters will not be so comprehensive as those of John because the chapters of Luke and Matthew are not so topical in character, but the points thus established will, in many cases, serve as nuclei around which to gather other details of the contents of the chapters as a whole. While, moreover, the incidents selected for this list are not the only ones that might have been selected they will doubtless serve their purpose, the establishing of a fixed point of memory, in each of the chapters of these three Gospels, as well as others. The lines of association by which they have linked themselves in my mind with the basic topics of the chapters of John will be carefully explained, but this will not preclude any from detecting other relationships of association or contrast which will, for them, broaden the foundation of memory at the selected points. The only thing further to be noted is that, on every recurrence to the table, the remembering of each item should be sought along the chosen channel of relationship. By so doing, after a very few repetitions, the rut, so to speak, will be established, and the act of memory practically automatic.

Turning now again to our table, note that the first chapter is taken up at outset with matter preceding the coming of Christ, and this thought "preceding" will serve to connect the first chapters of Luke and Matthew with the first chapter of John, as you will find by examination that Luke 1 is occupied with "John, the Forerunner," and Matt. 1 with "The Lineage of Jesus." After examining the records to verify this fact, enter the titles above given respectively in the first compartments of the columns for Luke and Matthew. In every case it is of the first importance that you verify by actual examination the facts noted in the table as here given. Further, do not be surprised if the incident chosen is not always the most important in the chapter. The avoidance of repetition, as well as the use of the laws of association, has guided to same extent the choice of the items noted. The second chapter of John is Christ's First Miracle, where the idea of "first things" is our mnemonic link to "Jesus' First Visits to the Temple," for Luke, and "First Homage to Jesus," for Matthew. John 3, "Christ and Nicodemus" in its reference to "baptism" gives clue to the "Ministry of John Baptist. Baptism of Jesus," for both Luke and Matthew. John 4, "Christ Preaches to the Woman of Samaria," gives in the thought of "preaching" the connecting link for "Preaching at Nazareth" (Luke) and "Preaching in Galilee" (Matt.). John 5 is "Heals Impotent man at Pool of Bethesda." Here the "water" of the pool is to lead the thought to the "Great Draught of Fishes" and similarity of condition will carry the idea from "impotent" to "Heals the Palsied," both for Luke, while we shall have to depend simply on the initial syllable "Be-" to recall "Beatitudes" for the fifth of Matthew. From John 6, "Feeding the Five Thousand," the matter of "food" should serve for "Disciples Plucking Corn" (Luke), and "The Lord's Prayer" ("Give us this day our daily bread"), for Matthew. Note also for Matt. 6, "The life is more than meat," etc.

In John 7, "Christ's Authority," the term "authority" may be allowed to suggest "Authority over Death at Nain" (Luke), and (limitations on human authority) "Judge Not, that Ye be not Judged" (Matt.). John 8 gives us "The Adulteress" and "Light and Truth" (see verses 12 and 32). "Truth," the seed of the kingdom, and "Light," the germinating force, will lead to "The Parable of the Sower" (Luke), while similarity of deplorable condition may suffice to call the mind from the adulteress to the "Maniac of Gadara" (Luke); and the moral leprosy of adultery may suggest for Matthew, "Healing a Leper." With the "Healing of the Man Born Blind," of John 9, associate the opening of Peter's eyes to Jesus' Sonship and the blindness of the bystanders to his power at the bedside of Jairus' daughter, and we shall be led to "Peter's Confession" (Luke) and "Raising of Jairus' daughter" (Matt.).

From John 10, "The Good Shepherd," the way is easy to "The Good Samaritan," (Luke) and (via "good" tidings) to "Choosing and Sending the Twelve" (Matt.). John 11, furnishing "Lazarus' Tomb Opened" as a starting point, permits association to carry us to the discourse containing "Knock and it shall be Opened," for Luke and the memory of the message sent by the sisters to Jesus will suggest the "Come unto Me all ye that Labor and are heavy Laden" for Matthew. John 12 contains "The Anointing in Bethany" and "The Triumphal Entry." The question as to the proper use of the wealth expended, raised at the table in Bethany, may be allowed to suggest for Luke the parable on a similar theme, "The Rich Fool," and the "Hosannas" of the triumphal entry may suggest by contrast the healing of a dumb man in the corresponding chapter of Matthew. Through "The Last Supper" of John 13, we are led (via "last") to "The Last Judgment" (Luke), and (note Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, "the last kingdom,") "Parables of the Kingdom" (Matt.). John 14 contains, "Let not your heart be troubled," opening that memorable discourse on "The Many Mansions." By association with the thought "many" via "many guests" we come to the parable of "The Great Supper" (Luke), and through the appropriateness of the opening phrase to the condition of John's disciples, we are led to the "Death of John Baptist" (Matt.). John 15, "The Vine and the Branches," may be made to suggest for Luke, "The Prodigal Son" (corrupt "branch" of the family) and by continued association through "husks that the swine did eat" to "the dogs that eat of the crumbs that fall from the master's table," for Matthew, the incident of "The Syrophœnician Woman." John 16 is the discourse on "The Comforter." The idea of "comfort" or rather its lack may suggest both parables, "The Unjust Steward" and "Dives and Lazarus" for Luke, while continued association on the fate of Dives may suggest for Matthew "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it. . . for what is a man profited," etc. In John 17 we start with "Christ's Prayer for the Unity of his Followers," and the mnemonic link is hardly as direct as in most other cases, but turning to the contrast with "unity" through "separation" we come (recalling the provisions of the Mosaic Law) to "The Ten Lepers" for Luke, and by way of the same idea of "separation" ("he bringeth them into a high mountain, apart,") to "The Transfiguration" for Matthew. John 18 gives us "Christ Humbling himself in Gethsemane." The path is direct by way of "humility" to "The Publican's Prayer" for Luke, and "The Little Child sat in the Midst" for Matthew. Through John 19, "Christ's Trial and Crucifixion," we reach (via "trial") "Christ's Trial of Zacchaeus" (Luke) and "Christ's Trial of the Rich Young Man" (Matthew). In John 20 we find "Christ Raised Up." The words of Christ to the Herodians seem to fit the event of his own resurrection ("unto God the things that are God's") and by this road we reach "The Question of the Tribute" for Luke 20, and by way of the idea of "exaltation" the "Strife of the Disciples for Place" is suggested for Matthew. John closes with the scene on the shores of the Sea of Galilee when, for the second time, there is a "Draught of Fishes."

A combination of association and contrast will lead us to the "great" gift of "The Widow's Mite" for Luke, and continued association on the terms "temple" and "money" may well suggest the overthrowing of the tables of the money-changers in "The Cleansing of the Temple" for the twenty-first of Matthew. There remain three chapters of Luke and seven of Matthew to be considered. Our general knowledge will tell us that the last two of each will deal with the facts respectively of the Crucifixion and Resurrection. There remains for Luke the twenty-second chapter and from that we choose the "Healing of Malchus' Ear" for recollection by direct memory. For Matthew, we list 22, "Marriage and Resurrection" (we may find a mnemonic link in the doubled figure two), 23, "Woe Unto you, Scribes and Pharisees," 24, "Destruction of Jerusalem and End of the World," 25, "The Ten Virgins" and "The Talents" (a mnemonic suggestion may be found in comparing the chapter number with the "ten" virgins and the "five" and "ten" in the parable of the talents), 26, "Peter's Denial." In conclusion. Do not think that this completes the study of the gospel narratives. It is hoped, indeed, that it will furnish a sure beginning of knowledge concerning them.

The Christ in Contrast.—VI.

W. J. Lahmon.

Christ the only Mediator.

Up from the depths of his sorrow there comes a cry of Job's giving pitiful, pleading expression to the whole world's need. He felt his alienation from God and he said, "He is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgment. O, that there were a daysman betwixt us that he might lay his hand upon us both." Among all the religionists of earth it is the privilege of Christians alone to "Find the far Father in the close sweet Son."

The Apostle Paul, as though giving a direct answer to the call that comes from Job, says, "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them, and hath committed to us the word of reconciliation." Many times and in a variety of ways the same apostle emphasizes the uniqueness of Christ in this respect. He says, "There is one God and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." When he speaks of justification by faith, it is faith in Christ that he means. When he speaks of having peace with God, it is through Christ. And when he speaks of our joy in God, that also is "through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the reconciliation."

If, as we have shown, Jesus stands alone in his claims and conduct and character; if he is unique in his death and resurrection and ascension; if he is indeed "holy, harmless and undefiled;" if he is "separate from sinners and made higher than the heavens," he stands alone also in this that "there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." He alone reconciles. He alone mediates. He alone is a daysman.

That Jesus believes himself competent to reconcile men to God appears in many of his words and deeds. When, bending over the paralytic, he said, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee," he claimed the power of reconciliation, for sin is that which separates, and the forgiveness of sin is that which reunites, or makes at one. Similarly in Simon's house he forgave the sinful woman who bathed his feet with her tears, and defended himself by saying, "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much." In forgiving sins thus he speaks with authority on the divine side of the question of reconciliation. The Pharisees understand him so and are greatly incensed, saying, "Who is this that forgiveth sins also?"

When he speaks on the human side of this same question he enforces the necessity of repentance, making that a condition of forgiveness. In the parable of the prodigal son the necessity of repentance is most beautifully and tenderly taught, and in it our human formula of reconciliation is fixed for all time: "I will arise and go to my father, and will say to him, 'Father, I have sinned, and am no more worthy to be called thy son; make me as thy hired servant.'" And where else shall we go for such a picture of forgiveness? Here is forgiveness that is quick and urgent, and wholehearted and complete. Here is restoration, and the joy of restoration, and the poetry of reunion. "My son was lost; he is found!

He was dead; he is alive!" What could be more beautiful! And where else shall we go to find anything so satisfactory?

Right up to the cross Jesus carries the same language and power and spirit. Hark! from the dying sinner at his side there is a prayer! "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." And the most ready and gracious answer, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

Upon his resurrection from the dead Jesus became the legislator of a new kingdom, a kingdom based upon repentance and forgiveness, and therefore upon reconciliation. It is said indeed that this kingdom is based upon faith; but faith that has not repentance for its fruitage is not faith, and forgiveness that is not followed by reconciliation is not forgiveness. It is not necessary here to so much as touch upon this and the other harsh and fruitless and even repulsive theory of the atonement. We stand in the presence of the reconciling Christ; we hear him pronounce the sweet word of forgiveness; we see him throw open the gates of his paradise to a penitent one; we gaze upon his picture of the father rushing out to meet the returning wanderer; we behold him in his resurrection and his regnancy till we bow before the new law of his new kingdom—"Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." We see and hear all this; what more can we want?

The whole Christ is the atoning Christ. There is atonement in his sermons, in his parables and prayers. There is atonement in his miracles, in the love that he inspires, and the forgiveness that he promises or rather pronounces, in his character, in his life, and death, and resurrection, and ascension and present regnancy. They do injustice to Jesus who limit his atoning virtue to his death or his blood. The whole of his earthly career is an atoning career. In the chain of that career his death is but one link. He died as he did because he lived as he did, and taught and wrought as he did. In his death and resurrection there are the climax and completion of an atoning life. In this climax and completion Jesus comes to his rightful regnancy, and in his commission he gives forth the law of his kingdom. That law is the law of atonement or of reconciliation, for the words must be used as synonyms. The Apostle Peter understood it so and preached it so on the day of Pentecost, since on that day he carried the commission into execution. And if we suppose the three thousand truly converted and brought into a saved state on that day, we must suppose that there was presented to them a full and final way of reconciliation. Now to them was presented Christ, and the death of Christ, and the resurrection of Christ, and the way of repentance and of obedience to Christ. All this the three thousand accepted, and therefore they were added to the number of the disciples.

In order to reconciliation there must be:

1. The recognition of God and the supremacy of God.

2. The recognition of man and the sinfulness of man.

3. The proclamation of pardon on the part of God conditioned upon repentance on the part of man.

4. The reconciling one must have authority from God and must establish himself in that authority before men.

All these conditions are fulfilled in Christ. He recognizes God and the supremacy of God. He knows man and the sinfulness of man, and nothing can induce him to abate one jot of his revelation of God and the goodness of God on the one hand, and of man and the exceeding sinfulness of man, together with his eternal danger, on the other. Then, again, the whole life of Christ is a call to repentance and a promise of pardon and peace. In his revelation of God as a Father there lies not wholly latent the proffer of forgiveness and the call to repentance. So in the revelation of man as a child of God; the revelation itself carries with it the logic of a needful return on the part of all sinful ones and the assurance of a hearty reception. In the fourth place the very person of Christ, established in our human history as at once the Son of God and the Son of Man, and speaking and acting with "all authority in heaven and in earth"—the very person of Christ is reconciliation. In him the human and the divine dwell together as one. In him God the Father and man the child stand united. He is not only the atoning One, he is atonement. The divine can dwell in the human; it has done so in Christ. The human can dwell in the divine; it has done so in Christ. His very being is the fact of atonement, and therefore the demonstration of it, and therefore a call to it.

Jesus, therefore, fills all the conditions of a mediator. He makes God real to us: he makes sin dreadful to us; he causes us to hunger and thirst after righteousness, and he feeds our hunger and quenches our thirst. He heals and forgives and promises and rewards. He suffers for us and with us, and receives in meekness the stripes that should have been laid upon us, and lives for us and dies for us and rises for us, and in every way intercedes for us, that by all means he may bring us back to the Father's home.

It is a most sweet and wonderful revelation, this of the way of salvation. "I love," says one, "as the stars come out to lift above my thoughts Richter's apologue, which represents an angel as once catching a man up into infinite space, and moving with him from galaxy to galaxy until the human heart fainted and called out, 'End is there none of the universe of God?' And the constellations answered, 'End is there none that ever we heard of.' Again the angel flew on with the man past innumerable architraves, and immensity after immensity, sown with rushing worlds; and the human heart fainted again and cried out, 'End is there none of the universe of God?' And the angel answered, 'End is there none of the universe of God; lo, also there is no beginning.' But if, while I, thus entranced, look into the sky, you bring above my gaze the page of the gospel recording the fact of the atonement, all other revelations of the divine glory appear in contrast but chaff and dust."

And now, though feeling that the above is but a hint of the great theme, a few sentences must be allowed by way of contrast. In what other teaching than that of Jesus is such an ideal so much as hinted at, much less brought to reality? Confucius knows nothing of it. Once more let it be stated, that it may not be forgotten, that great sage was entirely too great and real to claim for himself more than was his due. He said, "We cannot as yet perform our duties to men, how can we perform our duties to spirits?" He was a historian, and in no sense a savior. With the problems of sin and forgiveness and heaven and hell and God and the Fatherhood of God he does not deal at all. We cannot think of him as a "daysman." The very suggestion is preposterous.

Socrates seemed to believe in God, or perhaps one should say, gods. How he dealt with the question of immortality has already been stated. But the problem of sin and the forgiveness of it, vexed him. "Plato, Plato," he said, "perhaps God can forgive deliberate sin, but I do not see how." Here his great mind struggled mightily but blindly, and fell immeasurably below the revelations of Jesus.

And Mohammed and the Koran! Ah, that immoral prophet and his terrible book! One feels like offering an apology for naming them even in contrast to the Christ and the New Testament. Fatality and not forgiveness is the teaching of the Koran. The one word, Kismet, it is fate, gives the key to its teaching. Take a single sentence from the fifth chapter. "The Jews and Christians say, we are the children of God and his beloved. Answer, why therefore doth he punish you for your sins? Nay, but ye are men of those whom he created. He forgiveth whom he pleaseth, and punisheth whom he pleaseth; and unto God belongeth the kingdom of heaven and earth, and of what is contained between them both; and unto him shall all things return."

As to Buddhism; it holds not the comforting doctrine of repentance and forgiveness; is teaches law of karma. And what is karma but another name for consequence, or fate. Coupled with the doctrine of reincarnation it gives a most hopeless outlook for the worn soul. Buddhism attempted to reform Brahminism, but it did not escape from the pantheism and fatalism of India. In the doctrine of the karma and its associated reincarnation these religions agree. The goal they place before the soul is final absorption in the great all. Even this undesirable haven, the equivalent of annihilation, can be reached only by a voyage through 8,400,000 births and deaths.

The nearest approach to our Christian doctrine of reconciliation must be found in Moses and the prophets. It is there in type and shadow and burning word and holy exhortation. But it is all preparatory. It all falls into the apostle Paul's category of the slave who leads us to the school of Christ. Moses himself disclaimed finality, and spoke of one who should come after him and commanded that he should be heard. Sinai is sublime, but it is no match for Calvary, and the tongues of flame transcend by far the burning bush.

And so Socrates has his insoluble problem of sin and Mohammed his "Kismet," and Buddha his "Karma," and Moses his "Tables of Stone," but in Christ there is "the Way, the Truth and the Life." At this Christmas season we seem to hear again the angelic anthem, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will toward men." And with the wise men bending low we catch the whisper, "His name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins."

"Alone, O Love ineffable,
Thy saving name is given;
To turn aside from thee is hell;
To walk with thee is heaven.

"Apart from thee all gain is loss,
All labor vainly done;
The solemn shadow of thy cross
Is better than the sun."

EVOLUTION AT BARTLETT'S LANDING

By Burris A. Jenkins.

CHAPTER I.

In those old lonely days in Missouri just after the war, men sought every pretext to associate themselves in their work. When a new home was to be built, all the neighbors gathered—ten miles was often next door—to be in at the "raising." When grain was to be cut, all the able-bodied came to bind and stack the sheaves, and for diversion ran shouting after every poor rabbit that started from the mown wheat, till in their circle he cowered and was captured. When, later, the grain was to be threshed, it was a merry company that was encircled by the dust of the great machine, or cooled by the winds of noon at the tables in the shade. When, later still, apples were gathered and cider pressed, it was not the "hands" of one farm only that shook the trees, sang the songs and drank the foamy unfermented juice. Further yet into the autumn, when breaths could be seen, and hands and feet needed activity to keep comfortable, neighbors were wont at hog-killing time to pool their interests, to drive their prospective hams and sausages into the barn-lot, to build one great fire, set up one great scraping-table, and ply their knives in concert.

One November morning, frosty and fine, Bartlett's farmyard, in Clay County, saw half a score of men in jeans "pants" and tall high-heeled boots, with softening grease in the creases, busy about the pens and the scalding kettles. Bartlett's barn-lot had not seen such activity for a year and its denizens were astonished beyond measure. The cows crowded up to the gate from the pasture and looked through with wide eyes and doubtful head-shakings. The horses, turned out for the day, hung their necks over the top-rail, then, throwing their tails up, ran off snorting at the squeals of those about to die. Dignified young Brahmas and leghorns, from a discreet distance, clucked and clattered, but were assured by the older fowls that such a day as this had been seen in their own youth many, many roosts ago.

Suddenly, in the midst of their subdued conversation, the crack of a rifle startled these beasts of the field and fowls of the lot. Rifles, however, had never done them harm; so they merely twitched once, then resumed their native dignity. Among the hogs, however, it was not so. One of them dropped on his doubled-up legs in a paralysis that would never end, and the others were awed by the presence of death in the midst. They spoke in gutturals of horror and crowded the furtherest corner of the pen, with muddy feet in the water-trough.

Meanwhile the hapless hog, now nearly pork, was triced up, with chains about his hind-legs, drained of his crimson life by a thrust in the throat, rolled over and over in the boiling water, and, after a coast down the scraping table, was passed, unbristled, into the hands of three cutters, speedily to be converted into long red and white sides, suggestive of crisp winter breakfasts. In the hands of those great masterful fellows what could a poor hog do, even though he weighed three hundred pounds?

Evidently, too, these powerful despots seemed rejoicing, as conquerors ever do, in their might. Their sense of strength evidently gave them wondrous satisfaction. Spite of the nipping air, bare arms, cold as marble, and trousers clinging-wet, shouts of laughter, pointed or blunted jests, and even an occasional playful blow, or scuffle, testified abundant spirits in the younger men.

Bartlett, however, as always, was grave and staid. Indeed, such attitude was befitting a man of sixty-four, father of a grown daughter and leading elder in the "Campbellite" church. Use that name "Campbellite" in his presence, though, and his gray, shaggy brows would knit while his voice, deep but gentle, would make answer, "No. We are Disciples of Christ. Elder Campbell himself speaks only of the 'Church of Christ.' " If on this or other religious moot-point you took issue with him, he would argue, steadfast and unmovable as the red-oak in front of his door, but gentle as the breeze above his wheat in summer. Henry Winfield once said of him, "He's lamb's wool to the touch, but limestone to the push."

Surely Henry knew him if any did, and surely Henry was apt at telling what he knew. At least Henry had the reputation of a ready speaker in the meeting. As corroborative of this, listen to the words of a brawny youth on the south side of the scraping table.

"Henry, you preached like a threshing machine last night."

"So, Luke? But I didn't thresh all the chaff out of you, it seems."

"No, but you did set up a straw man and knock him endways. My, how you did wallop them airy pagites on Marsh hill—"

"Areopagites on Mars Hill, Luke!"

"Well, anyway," returned Luke calmly, "It's all the same. There ain't been one of 'em caught in this neck of the woods for many a long day."

"You're mistaken," smiled Henry. "There are plenty such arrogant intellectualists—"

"Well, I don't know what them is. I believe in fighting real enemies. Why d'n't you give it to the Methodists? They'se plenty of them around. That would have been more interestin'."

Henry smiled quietly, leaving Luke to the blessedness of ignorance, and went on with his work, cheek by jowl with old Bartlett. After a moment of silence the latter said in a low voice:

"Why didn't ye, Henry?"

"Why didn't I what?" asked Henry, who, either actually or feignedly, had lost thread of the conversation.

"Why didn't you fire a shot or two at the Methodists? Your text made it almost necessary."

"I've been wondering lately whether any text makes it necessary to fire shots."

Crack! rang the rifle and another victim was swung into the boiling water.

"Now when you're killin' hogs," continued Henry, "that's different. They're made to kill, but your fellow-Christians—"

"Henry! Call Methodists fellow-Christians! I'm amazed at ye!"

"Well—" hesitated the young theologian, and got no further. He had pondered much of late, and feared that he was growing away from the close fellowship of thought he had borne to the older man. Young Winfield had been brought up at the feet of Bartlett. He had absorbed the old man's notions as they two sat many a time, rifles on their knees, in the thick woods by the river where the deer came down to drink. The old man had taught him to send a bullet through a turkey's eye at a hundred yards, and a text through an opponent's argument at close range and on the wing. Henry had always been a serious-minded youth, and the old man's heart had early knit to him as Paul's to Timothy.

"He'll be elder some day, when I am gone. Maybe before," would Bartlett say.

Henry never stood about the door of the log meeting-house on a Sunday morning swapping yarns, horses, and chews of flat-tobacco with the general run of Clay County youth. He walked with the grave and middle-aged. And yet he bore the reputation of a man of strength and courage. When only fifteen he had swum the Missouri. At sixteen he had tracked a horse thief to bay in a cave on the Little Platte, where they fought it out with six-shooters from behind ledges of limestone; and had brought the wretch, wounded, back to pioneer justice.

As further evidence of the esteem in which he was held, it is said that one summer afternoon, at a farmer's picnic, Jane Bartlett, daughter of the Elder, and commonly called "Jinnie," for short, had sat well hidden from the older folk, behind a clump of willows by the "crick," playing casino with a group of gay young men and women. For you must know that, in that elder day, a young girl might play cards, reel it with the best in "skip to maloo" and other country games, ride like an Indian anything on four legs at breakneck speed, and otherwise prove that good, rich, red blood was in her veins, and her reputation be none the worse. Jane was, it must be confessed, a source of some care to the mild, severe old Elder, but "Never mind, Paw," his good wife would say, "she'll come out well. She's a good heart." The Elder would shake his head, but look none the less proudly at his only child when next he saw the vigorous bloom on her white cheek.

Well, Jane sat behind the willows that June day, when her partner in the game, Jim Ratliff, well known to be among her most ardent admirers, ventured some sneering allusion to Henry Winfield as a "Campbellite hypocrite, a great girl-boy." Instantly Jane flushed like the sumach in summer, and replied, angry, but half-laughing:

"Say that to his face, cowardly calf! You dassent, you great knock-kneed body! You know well enough he c'n outride you, outrun you, outshoot you, and outfight you—he could throw you with his little finger with one hand tied behind him, but you know he won't fight just because my Paw's got him in the notion of bein' an Elder—and he'll make as good a one as Paw, too! But you, you haven't got sense enough to know a man when you see him!"

With which astonishing speech, she threw the deck of cards in the face of the Pike County Gentile, stood up blushing, and smoothed out her dress and her temper. Jane was half ashamed of lapsing so thoroughly into the vernacular, for she burst into a laugh to hide her confusion; then, still half frowning, with one of the fine curtsies of her St. Louis boarding school, betook herself over the hill into the throng of the dignified. This episode broke up the card game and Jim Ratliff's suit.

New York Letter.

For three weeks I was in Philadelphia preaching through a series of meetings at the Third Christian Church, of which the Rev. G. P. Rutledge is pastor, and learned much of the condition of the cause of Christ in the City of Brotherly Love.

The church where the meetings were held is about twenty years old and has an active membership of 400, a Bible-school of something over 500, a Ladies' Aid Society of more than 100 members, and other auxiliary societies in the same proportion. This good work had its incipiency in the faithful labors of the lamented Hugh Chain, whose widow and children loyally stand by the cause that was so dear to him. The church has many noble men and chief women not a few whose hearts are wedded to Christ and his work. They did all they could to make my stay a delightful one. Bro. Rutledge is doing an excellent work and enjoys the confidence and esteem of all the people. His work is growing rapidly and is full of bright promise. There were thirteen accessions to the church during the meetings and others were set thinking on things pertaining to the kingdom of God.

The First Church work moves along nicely under the pastoral care of Bro. R. G. Frank who recently came among them as their minister. I heard only good reports concerning him. The First Church is one of the oldest among the Disciples and has some of the choicest spirits among its membership. This is the spiritual home of Dr. E. E. Montgomery, the celebrated physician whose love and liberality for apostolic Christianity abounds, and who is the president of our Atlantic States Conference.

The Kensington Church is ministered to by Bro. W. A. Smith who reports the work as growing and the outlook as bright. He came to this church recently from Indiana. This congregation contemplates building a house of worship; at present they meet in a hall.

The Fourth Church is located in West Philadelphia and is under the pastoral care of Bro. Arthur Holmes. They meet in a hall at present, but broke ground recently for the erection of a new house. They have a good Sunday-school and a hopeful future.

The Sixth Church, in North Philadelphia, enjoys the ministerial efforts of Bro. A. E. Palmer who reports good prospects in his field of labor. Each of the five congregations in Philadelphia has a pastor. Every Monday morning the ministers all meet at the Central Y. M. C. A. Building and report the progress in their several fields. They are a happy, united band of workmen, loyal and true.

Bro. R. R. Bulgin, general manager of the syndicate which has deeded to the Disciples of Christ a tract of land for the Bethany Beach Encampment near Ocean View, Delaware, was with us during a part of our series of meetings. He sold a number of cottage sites to the Disciples in Philadelphia. The outlook for the proposed encampment by the sea is encouraging. The auditorium is to be dedicated July 4 and a series of meeting-lectures, musicales and revivals will follow the opening. All the Disciples of the East should plan to attend these services and enjoy the refreshing sea breezes and also the season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

The committee which has in charge the opening and direction of the new century revival work is planning to open the campaign in New York with many watch night services Dec. 31. William Philip Hall, the "lay evangelist," Mr. W. R. Moody and a host of ministers and distinguished business men are at work planning the campaign. Boston, New York, Providence and Philadelphia will be evangelized with strong forces. Other cities will be visited later and efforts made to engage all the local Christian forces in special efforts to save the lost. England and Scotland also will join in the movement, so that the work will be pushed forward at once on both continents. Let the Disciples of Christ join heartily in this movement and strongly preach the way of salvation as they alone can do.

From Damascus to Caesarea Philippi.

Charles Reign Scoville.

At sunrise Wednesday morning, Oct. 10, our horses were brought up before the hotel and there was no little excitement, as each man was anxious to select the best horse for the long tour of 225 miles across deserts and over mountains to Jerusalem. The health of the rider as well as his safety depends largely upon getting an easy-gaited, sure-footed horse. We chose by lot and I drew a beautiful young bay with black mane and tail, and a fine walker. But before we had gone two miles I discovered that our merchant, who had never been on a horse, was riding like a pile-driver. His horse would pace or gallop, but was a very poor walker. I knew this bobbing up and down would soon wear them both out, and so offered him mine. It proved a good trade for him and I soon found my pure white horse, which I named Napoleon, was the best runner in the bunch.

We were exceedingly fortunate in securing Cook's best dragoman—M. Chalil S. Gandour, a native Syrian, who lives at Jaffa (Joppa), where he was educated in the American College. He speaks English splendidly, thoroughly understands his business and does everything on time. He is a pure Christian, thoroughly upright in all his dealings and knows more of the Scriptures than some of the preachers in our own party. His descriptions of the various places visited were simply grand. He conducted the German emperor and his retinue of 200 across Palestine two years ago, and our party of seven in about one-half Bedouin regalia, with one dragoman, cook, two servants and three muleteers, 14 horses, six pack-mules and two donkeys, made no small spectacle—at least in our American eyes—as we filed out of Damascus westward on the old Roman road. We passed the Turkish barracks, where several thousand soldiers were drilling, and the sound of bugles, the glitter of the sun's first rays on swords and bayonets and the music of military bands seemed to bid us a fitting adieu as we left the oldest city founded by man.

We soon halted at the reputed spot where Saul "as he journeyed and came near to Damascus" fell to the earth, "when suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven—and he heard a voice saying: 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?'"

We reached Alton's village with its low, flat-roofed mud houses, at 11:30 A. M., and took lunch in the shade of an old mill near by, where two women were washing wheat and then grinding it very coarsely. This, with the people on the flat roofs, reminded me of the Scriptures, "two women shall be grinding at the mill," and "let him which is on the house-top not come down." While we were eating a caravan of 72 camels passed. They were en route to Beirut and each one was loaded with 500 pounds of wheat. Our dragoman informed us that a camel is worth about $50, a donkey from $5 to $40 and a horse from $40 to $60. A common laborer receives from 12 to 50 cents a day, and he must pay for his board from this. Girls receive from 50 cents to a dollar per week and also their board and clothes. But the clothes wouldn't make an Atlantic City bathing suit, and are of the poorest possible material.

There is scarcely any money in circulation in the smaller towns, and where a woman came for tomatoes she brought a little wheat which was placed in one end of an old pair of balances and tomatoes in the other until they balanced. Wheat and tomatoes are of equal value here. When another woman came to buy grapes, her wheat was divided equally in the scoops of the balances and then one scoop was emptied and grapes put in until it balanced again. Grapes are worth twice as much as wheat. Tomatoes are worth twice as much as barley, and at another place we saw them divide the wheat into three parts and then take two parts and balance it with the grapes. Figs are worth about one cent a pound in our money.

We rode 25 miles the first day, to the base of the Anti-Libanus mountains, with snow-capped Mt. Hermon in sight and the hills of Bashan to our left, and stopped at Betima, a little town owned by a Jew. It has 200 mud houses and 1,000 inhabitants, all Mohammedans, and there is neither store, postoffice, school nor church of any kind whatever. About sundown the shepherds began to bring in the goats from the surrounding mountains, and they kept coming in such vast flocks that we followed them and found that no less than 10,000 goats are kept in this little village. Of course we often ate their meat and called it mutton, but to drink goat's milk in my coffee went against my Yankee stomach. In the cities here, instead of hauling the milk around to you in cans, the milkman drives the goats around to your door and milks them there according to your order.

Our camp was on the banks of the beautiful little Pharpar (II Kings 5:12), in which we all took a cool and refreshing bath and then retired, each man having discovered a thousand new muscles in his body, and every one of them a sore one. We found it necessary to travel as little as possible in the middle of the day under the scorching Syrian sun. Most of our party wore colored glasses and we all wore a silk keffiyele about our heads which completely covered our necks and faces all but the eyes.

Our dragoman called us at 5 o'clock and we started at seven and soon passed the ruins of the old Temple of Nimrod (?) grandson of Ham. We now began to ascend the mountains which below are covered with blocks of basalt, then farther up, huge volcanic rocks predominate. It was marvelous to see with what ease and precision our horses would ascend and descend these steep rocky slopes. At 11:15 we reached the summit and had our last view of Damascus—which appeared like an oasis in the desert—and our first view of Palestine. We halted in a Druse village for lunch and I counted 17 children in the doors and windows watching us eat. Of course our food was furnished prepared by our own cook. The Druses and Arabs are constantly at war with each other and they frequently sweep down on an Arab village and plunder it and drive off their flocks and herds. We passed an Arab village this morning that was plundered by the Druses only three days ago. This town of 2,000 people has only one spring or well and no doctor. If a man dies, they say: "This is his day to die, God put it and God take it." They have a word "Kismet," which means "God's will," and whether everything goes right or wrong they say Kismet.

At 2 o'clock we sighted the Jordan and greeted it with a shout, then spontaneously began singing:

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wishful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land."

Then descending the mountains for three hours, we dismounted at Cæsarea Philippi. The present village consists of about fifty houses (most of which are enclosed within the ancient castle wall), and is called Baniyas, which is a corruption of the name of the original heathen Greek city called Paneas, after Pan, the god of music, and which according to Josephus was also the name of the district. This city is probably the Baal-gad of the Bible and marks the northernmost limits of Joshua's conquests (Josh. 11:17, and 13:5).

Just above the village a spur of Mt. Hermon terminates in a precipitous cliff of limestone and basalt, which is about 200 feet high. About half way up on one side of this cliff is an old mosque. As I sat on the railing of a sort of veranda here, just at sundown, it seemed an ideal place for meditation, memory and imagination. Just below me was by far the greatest spring that I had ever beheld, a perfect river bursting forth from the mighty rock—and that river the historic Jordan, whose waters parted for Joshua and Israel's hosts, and for Elijah and Elisha, and in which Naaman dipped seven times and was cleansed, and best of all, it is the very river in which our blessed Master was baptized, and which has ever been the symbol of a dividing line between this life and eternal felicity with him.

Just south of this spring is a large grotto which was once a sanctuary of Pan and called Paneiod. Some think it was previously used as a sanctuary of Baal. Cut in the face of the cliff just south of the grotto or cavern are four "votive niches," and over the most eastern one is an inscription in Greek, "Priest of Pan."

Between this cavern and the spring once stood the temple built by Herod in honor of Augustus. Philip, his son, enlarged the city and named it Cæsarea in honor also of Cæsar and in order to distinguish it from the other Cæsarea, added his own name and called it Cæsarea Philippi. Here Titus celebrated the fall of Jerusalem with gladiatorial combats, compelling the Jewish captives to enter the arena with wild beasts or to fight each other for his amusement.

About one mile east of where I was seated, on the summit of a narrow ridge which is about 1,200 feet above the plain and 2,500 above sea level, is the ruins of an old castle erected by the Franks. It is 480 yards long and about 120 yards wide and completely covers the top of the great rock or mountain. Its massive walls are well preserved and Capt. Condor pronounces it "one of the most magnificent ruins in Syria."

I remembered the conversation which occurred between Jesus and his disciples in this very city (Matt. 16:13-20), and called the attention of one of our party to Bro. McGarvey's statement that this fortress, previous to the invention of gunpowder, must have been impregnable and might well suggest the majestic imagery of the ever memorable and precious words: "On this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hades shall not prevail against it."

We had at last reached a place visited by our blessed Master, and when I remembered that somewhere just above us was "the holy mount" where occurred the grandest scene on earth, the transfiguration, I could scarcely control my emotions, and left the place with profound gratitude to our Father for that which my eyes had seen and my heart had felt. Surely "it was good for us to be here."

Jamaica Letter.

C. E. Randall.

The latest news from Jamaica concerns the work of the Christian Endeavor among us. We have just been holding the eighth convention of the Jamaica Christian Endeavor Union, which has been in several respects the best yet held. In Kingston there are over one thousand members of fourteen societies. Delegates and representatives came from all parts of the island, to the number of more than one hundred. The meetings commenced on Saturday evening with a prayer-meeting held in the Christian Church, which was more than filled, and a real Endeavor prayer-meeting was held. The following days, till Thursday morning, were crowded with engagements; at the principal of which the largest buildings in the city—one holding nearly two thousand people—were overcrowded. There are some special difficulties in carrying on Christian Endeavor work in our churches here. One of these is the fewness of efficient leaders. As many ministers have three or four churches under their care, it is impossible for them to lead societies in all; and there are a number in which competent leaders are not to be found. The difficulty, however, is being met by the movement itself which finds and develops talent. It is to be regretted that the upper and well educated class personally hold aloof from the movement and seem to think it too plebeian for their patronage. The Episcopal Church has not, at present, a single society. They have, however, gone as far as discussing it in their diocesan council; and the archbishop, at an interview with the president and secretary of the union, told them that every clergyman would in future be at liberty to follow his own judgment in the matter. Considering our circumstances the work of the Christian Endeavor has made very pleasant advance on the island. This is largely due to the zealous and indefatigable and efficient efforts of our secretary, Mr. J. E. Randall. His report showed that we have now 133 societies with 1,996 members. The outlook certainly indicates a large increase in the near future. At present the Baptists are far in advance as to numbers. It is satisfactory to observe that the work of the societies is exerting an influence for good on the missionary spirit of the young people, and that it is beginning to tell on the home life, in seeking to improve the homes, which is a matter of paramount importance in Jamaica.

I have no doubt that Christian Endeavor work, like other Christian work, has been retarded somewhat by the continued hard times in the island. There is great scarcity of labor and money. The government is still trying to retrench in its expenditure; but does this in ways that are felt most by the poorer class of people—cutting down already small enough salaries and stopping public works, while the large salaries of the high officials are regarded as sacred. There is some talk of increasing taxation, which is already a heavy burden on the middle and lower classes. As a result of scarcity of work, there has been a large exodus of laboring men to Equador during the last two months. More than two thousand have left to work on the construction of a railway there. Others are preparing to go. One bad result of this is that many of the wives and children are left almost unprovided for, and the conditions of life are such that the laborers become so demoralized that those who return often prove to be a plague in the community. Many church members go, and almost invariably become greatly deteriorated. There is now a report that a new railway is to be constructed in Cuba. If so, that island being so near, there will be a great demand for Jamaica laborers. Already our population is too small, if we were favored with anything like prosperous times. Many are hoping for great things to result from the opening of the direct line of steamers to England. This is to take place in February, 1901. The contractors are Messrs. Elder Dempster & Co. Our government is going to give a subsidy of $200,000 a year to aid the undertaking. The object is, in the first place, to provide rapid transit for our fruit and to open a new market in England for our bananas, oranges, etc. Passenger rates will be reduced, and thus traffic be encouraged. It may prove a great boon to the island, and may possibly provide an important offset to the competition that is almost sure to arise as Cuba and Porto Rico increase their cultivation.

The Two Centuries.

J. L. Pinkerton.

The Nineteenth Century.

Thy days are numbered,
The footstep of thy royal Heir is on
The Date-line of the world; and swift his way
Glides o'er the Asian lines,

Bringing to us who stand
Within the shadows of the Past and on
The sounding shores of that which has been once,
But can be Nevermore,

Thy flaming torch of Truth,
The search-light of our coming way along
The iron coasts, o'er storm-swept deeps of Moveless Eternity.

What changes thou has wrought!
Millenniums of the past have done much less;
And lighter, for Thee, lies on the human heart
Its pallid weight of woe.

Sleep, thou mighty Dead,
Free from fetters both of Mind and Form
Which thou hast broken, we pass with veiled hearts
Thy stately Catafalque.

But now a long Farewell!
The longest, Earth and Thou shalt meet no more.
Grand the Form, the Face, where lies in staet
The Nineteenth Century!

The Twentieth Century.

Le Roi est mort! Vive le Roi!
Hail Century, Twentieth of thy name!
Majestic Heir, not of our Age and time alone,
But of dateless times and kings!
Who shall prophesy
What Earth shall be when thou hast run thy course?
But ere thou goest, we shall be away
Sailing the Unresting Deep.

Our dust shall sleep around
The slowly smoldering camp-fire of the Sun,
And centuries to be shall puzzle o'er
These prehistoric times.

Century of Hope,
Which the storm-spots on thy disk may not o'ercloud.
We who are about to die salute you.
Welcome is but Farewell.

Current Literature.

How to Pray, by R. A. Torrey, is a helpful devotional book by the superintendent of the Moody Bible Institute. Mr. Torrey's books are already well known. He commands a large hearing and he has become in a measure, through his position at the head of the institute, Mr. Moody's successor in Chicago. (Revell, 50 cents).

Attention has been already called in advance to the publication of Mrs. M. B. Fuller's Wrongs of Indian Womanhood. It is a heart-rending story, full of vivid and even lurid pictures of Hindoo home life and the recital bears all the marks of entire credibility. The author speaks from her experience as a resident in Bombay. The commendation of Pundita Ramabai, who writes the introduction, will introduce the book favorably to American readers. (Revell, $1.25.)

Mr. W. E. Simmonds, the author of Whither? A Study of Immortality, is a lawyer and he has written a distinctly able little book on a great subject. The argument is rather scientific than biblical. It makes no appeal to authority, but argues from the infinity of time and space and the indestructibility of matter to the immortality of the mental life in connection with a finer substance—the subtle substance out of which the "spiritual body" is to be made. (John B. Alden. New York. $1.00).

Mr. Book is well known among the Disciples of Christ in Virginia and elsewhere. His evangelistic efforts for several years past have been among the potent causes of our growth in the Old Dominion. In his new book, Real Life and Original Sayings, he gives an account of his career both in public and private life. One of his sermons is also included and at the end of the book there are several pages of pungent paragraphs and original sayings. There are several pictures in the volume, including three of the author. (Published by the author. Martinsville, Va., $1.00).

In view of the often repeated statement that Lincoln was an unbeliever, the pamphlet on The Religion of Abraham Lincoln has a mission. It consists for the most part of letters on the subject which passed between Gen. Collis and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. One thing is certain —that Lincoln was either a believer in the existence and providence of God, or he was a shameless hypocrite. Take these words which he spoke in 1863 in one of the darkest hours of the war: "I do not trust in the bravery and devotion of the boys in blue; God bless them though. Nor yet do I rely on the loyalty and skill of our generals, though I believe we have the best generals in the world at the head of our armies. But the God of our fathers, who raised up this country to be the refuge and the asylum of the oppressed and down-trodden of all nations, will not let it perish now." This is not, as Col. Ingersoll said, "the religion of Voltaire and Tom Paine." (G. W. Dillingham Co., New York. 25c.)

Two notable additions have been made this season to the already vast library of Shakespeare literature. Mr. Mabie's "William Shakespeare," a book of many illustrations and charming literary style, makes its appeal to the general reader, and has a value of its own as a work of literature. Sidney Lee's Shakespeare's Life and Work is a book for students. Although it is an abridgement of the author's larger work, it contains all the material which the average student, even of a considerable degree of advancement, is likely to need in obtaining a general survey of the dramatist's career and the development of his genius. The treatment of the sonnets, a subject always fraught with many difficulties, is unusually satisfactory considering its brevity. The student of the details of Shakespeare's life and literary products will need other books, but this one can be used to advantage either for class work or for individual study for a general course on Shakespeare. (The Macmillan Co. 80c.)

There has not appeared for many a day a more sprightly tale of adventure than Henry Thew Stevenson's Patroon Van Volkenburg. The reader is plunged into events at the very first page and from beginning to end the movement never slackens. In the art of keeping a story going and keeping the reader going with it, the author has achieved a distinct success. The field is old New York or "Manhattan in 1699," and the leading characters are a French Huguenot refugee, who had his sister's death to avenge, a princely Dutch merchant, who aimed to set up a feudal domain on the present site of Harlem, the British governor of York and various other personages with glaring vices or bitter grievances, who make first-class material for a romance. The love story is inconspicuous and might have been omitted without materially interfering with the narrative, or the interest. In fact it scarcely appears until within fifty pages of the end. In the fertility of his inventiveness particularly in the matter of intrigue and counter-plot, the author suggests Anthony Hope. Indeed the story is perhaps more like "Phroso" than anything else. It may, perhaps, not be too much to say even that Mr. H. T. Stevenson has points of similarity to that other Stevenson, the beloved R. L. S., most blood-curdling of patient invalids and most amiable narrator of piratical villainies. At any rate he has a good story to tell and knows how to tell it. (The Bowen-Merrill Co., Indianapolis. $1.50.)

The identification of the Anglo-Saxon race with that part of the descendants of Jacob known as the "lost tribes" has long been a favorite idea and a fascinating study with many persons. The author of The Anglo-American Alliance in Prophecy (Our Race Publishing Co., New Haven, Con., $2.00) is an enthusiast on the subject, and his book gives evidence of great labor and research. The theory is, in short, that the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, to whom Jacob gave his parting blessing, are the chief progenitors of the people of the northern kingdom of Samaria, known as Israel in contra-distinction to Judah; that these ten tribes were carried into captivity into a corner of Media, from which they passed northward into a corner in Asia, and thence through the gate of the Caucasus mountains into a corner of Russia, and thence to a corner of Europe between the Baltic and Slie, from which place they migrated later into England and that from them have sprung the Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic peoples. The case on the historical side as to the lines of migration, seems to be fairly well made out, and the quotations given from leading historians are very interesting in their bearing on this question. The author cites many prophecies concerning Israel which he claims have never had any fulfillment unless it be in the history of the Anglo-Saxon people. This point, too, is fairly well established, if we allow the author's distinction between what he calls the three great covenants which God made with Abraham, namely the National Covenant, the Christian Covenant and the Racial Covenant. Prophecies which many of us have supposed could only have their fulfillment in a Christian sense through Christ, he claims have their application to the racial covenant and their fulfillment in the history of the Anglo-Saxon people. The author's method of dealing with prophecy is hardly in keeping with modern scholarship, to say nothing of any destructive criticism. He finds the defeat of the Spanish armada, the revolutionary war and our war with Spain, and the battle of Manila Bay, all subjects of prophecy. We think he has carried his prophetic argument too far in this respect, and that in his zeal, too, he has based an argument for identification on the derivation of the words Saxon, deriving it from I-saacsons, and English from engel, the Hebrew word for calf, which the Israelites worshiped in Samaria. We do not believe these derivations can be maintained on philological grounds. But to these criticisms we must add another, that there is too much repetition in the work. The author states the same position in many different ways and cites the same prophecies many times in proof of the same point. Perhaps this may have the value of fastening the argument on the memory, but brevity is considered a merit in these days.

But in spite of these criticisms we are bound to say the book is an exceedingly interesting one and contains a large amount of valuable historical information aside from the particular theory which the author is seeking to establish. He has made a valuable contribution to this question, and we thoroughly agree with the conclusion at which he arrives, that the Anglo-Saxon people ought to work together in friendly alliance with the Teutonic nations for the uplifting of the race. And we believe with him, too, that the signs of the times point to such a consummation.

—Exit nineteenth century!

—Welcome twentieth century!

—"The King is dead: long live the King!"

—New occasions teach new duties.

—Strange no one seems to doubt but that the world is going forward, not backward.

—Let us ring out the old, so far as the old is false or imperfect, and ring in the new, so far as it is true.

—It is a splendid time to introduce reforms in our individual lives, which we have been promising ourselves to do for a long time.

—There be many prophets now of things to come to pass during the next century, but it is safe to say that the half will never be told until it becomes a fact. Progress seldom runs along anticipated lines.

—An impressive union watch service was held at the Central Christian Church, this city, on the last night of the old year, to watch out the old century and to welcome the new. The various Christian churches were represented and several important matters were considered and acted upon looking to the welfare of our cause in this city. Some of these will be explained more fully in our next issue.

—In the poem, "A Creed in Verse: What we Stand For," which appears on our first page, our readers will recognize two familiar stanzas which have appeared at the head of our columns for many years. They closed a statement of what the paper stands for, the first part of which was in prose. The editor has thrown the whole statement into verse, prefixing two stanzas to the original ones, and adding a final one. He hopes the poem as it now appears will meet with the same cordial welcome which has been accorded to it in its briefer form.

—It has often been observed that there is a sort of literary epidemic to which writers and publishers are subject which rules the matter of naming books and periodicals. At one time every one who writes a novel will give it a sentence-long title like "Put Yourself in His Place" and "He Fell in Love with His Wife." Again there will be a run on quotations or on quotations from particular authors. Several titles had been found in the book of Common Prayer before "To Have and To Hold" and it is said that almost every available phrase in the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam has been either used or spoken for by some writer. And now there comes another fad in the naming of magazines. The irrelevantly titled "Black Cat" has already become familiar. A later candidate for public favor bears the name "The Grey Goose." "Hist, we shall have more anon." It cannot be far from Gray Goose to the Pink Rooster and the Purple Duck, and with this burst of iridescent journalism the new century may be ushered in with a gorgeous rainbow of hope.

—A brother writes to us from Indian Territory that the congregation in his town is so afflicted with anti-ism that it is impossible to get the members of the church to subscribe for any religious paper, or sanction the use of Sunday-school literature, or contribute to missions, or permit the young people to organize an Endeavor Society, or the ladies a Ladies' Aid, or to allow anybody to do "anything that is edifying or elevating." The crisis was reached in this congregation when an attempt was made to observe Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America, which precipitated a withdrawal of a majority of the children from the Sunday-school at the behest of their parents who were unwilling to have them rally for America, and finally the secession of about half of the church and the organization of a separate congregation. It is distressing to hear that this sort of thing is still going on and especially in this new territory, which is even now a candidate for statehood and in which we are laying the foundation for a great future. Very likely those very brethren who refused to countenance the observance of Boys and Girls' Rally Day, because it was a co-operative effort, are heartily in sympathy with the united effort which is being made to secure statehood for the Indian Territory and Oklahoma. It would take a long time to reach that end without united action, and indeed the desire to come into the Union indicates an appreciation of the benefits of co-operation. Extreme individualism, which is commonly called anti-ism, is as insufficient a policy in religion as in politics.

—We direct the attention of our readers to the advertisement of "The Campbell Library" in this issue. The time-payment feature of this offer will doubtless appeal to many who have long desired to possess the complete works of Alexander Campbell.

—We publish in another place an appeal from F. E. Meigs, missionary to China, for his school at Nankin. Brother Meigs is known to be doing a very valuable work in teaching in China, and any encouragement or assistance which our readers can extend to him will be most worthily bestowed and heartily appreciated.

—The Editor of this paper enjoyed a pleasant Lord's day with the First Church at Paducah, Ky., on Dec. 23. By the invitation of the pastor, W. H. Pinkerton, who was suffering from temporary illness, we were there to fill his pulpit. The church building, erected about six years ago at a cost of $26,000, is a splendid structure, modern in all its appointments, and the church seems to be doing fine work in all departments. Brother Pinkerton is well beloved by the church. We were greeted with fine audiences morning and evening. The music was especially fine. The church on Tenth Street, ministered to by Brother I. H. Teel, is also doing well, and the two congregations are working in unity. We were glad to see a memorial window in the building of the First Church in which is a splendid picture of the lamented George E. Flower, who was for twelve years pastor of the church. It was a pleasure also to meet his widow and his daughter Daisy, whose home is in Evansville, Ind., but who were here on a visit to old friends during the holidays.

—Our Presbyterian contemporary, the Herald and Presbyter, is still as foggy on the use of the terms "Sabbath" and "Sunday" as if there had never been any enlightening discussion on the point. In urging the use of Sabbath instead of Sunday, especially when speaking of religious events, it very truly points out that Sunday is a pagan word while Sabbath has been from the beginning a day sacred to Jehovah. But the writer ought to remember that the Hebrew Sabbath was the seventh day of the week. He says: "There is a heathen name for the first day of the week, but we prefer to give to it the name which God himself has chosen for it." Begging the pardon of our contemporary, we suggest that God himself never chose the name Sabbath for the first day of the week. It may be suggested, too, that we are not shut up to the choice between the pagan word Sunday and the Hebrew Sabbath, which is properly the name of something else. The term "Lord's Day" is significantly Christian and at the same time correct. A good friend (Baptist, I believe,) once argued that Sabbath was too grand a word to be allowed to fall into disuse. It is a grand word, to be sure, and many sacred memories cluster about it, but that is no reason why we should use it indiscriminately. George Washington is a grand name, but we do not use it when we wish to designate Abraham Lincoln. Jerusalem is a good name, but we do not use it when we mean Antioch. Melchisedek and Popocatepetl and Kalamazoo are all good names when rightly used, but any name ceases to be good when used for something to which it does not belong. By all means let us keep the Hebrew word Sabbath—to use when we mean the Hebrew Sabbath.

—The action of the Kansas City ministers' meeting in passing a resolution which, according to the somewhat sensational reports of the daily press, aims to "taboo the prayer-meeting," has called forth many unfavorable comments and protests, some of which we might print if space permitted. In the absence of more authentic information than that conveyed in these dispatches, we venture the assurance that the Kansas City ministers have not taken any action which can be properly construed as tabooing the prayer-meeting. More than likely they expressed an unfavorable opinion about certain kinds of prayer-meetings and there is evidence that they suggested that the mid-week service should be made more educative. They may, for all we know, have gone farther than this and said some things which we would not endorse, but on the supposition that the proposed change in the character of the mid-week meeting in the direction of introducing some educational features, such as a sytematic Bible study, the suggestion does not seem to us to involve any very violent heresy. Certainly the church needs a mid-week meeting. Almost as certainly most churches need such a change in the character of that meeting as will give it the inspiration and interest which it now very commonly lacks. It would be a bold assertion to say that the prayer-meeting is a genuine success in half of our churches. That it is not is a fact not altogether discreditable to the membership. Why may it not be worth while, instead of railing at the pew for failure to appear on Wednesday or Thursday night, to begin to consider how the mid-week meeting may be made more profitable and more attractive? Brother Tyler at Denver has made the prayer-meeting a success by introducing Bible study, making it at once educational and devotional. Why not try this plan more generally?

—Elsewhere in this issue will be found a statement in regard to the third Congress of the Disciples which is to be held next March in Lexington, Ky. The general topics to be considered are: the religious and theological bearings of the doctrine of evolution, the psychology of religious experience and some phases of the work of the Disciples. The men who are to present papers will soon begin the preparation of them. We suggest that those who intend to be present also begin the study of the subjects with a view to intelligent hearing and discussion. Read a good book or two on evolution, especially one by some advocate of the theory such as Fiske or Drummond or Lyman Abbott, for it is always safer to get an exposition of a theory from its friends than from its enemies. Read a modern representative book on psychology—such, for instance, as James (the shorter edition), which is not only thoroughly scientific and up to date, but is as fascinating as Anthony Hope or Conan Doyle. And give yourself a review course in the history of the Disciples. Such preparation on the part of the hearers will keep the speakers up to their best efforts and will insure intelligent discussion.

—The death of Mrs. Katherine Stirman of Fayetteville, Ark., in November last, was an event that profoundly stirred the community in which she had lived so long and in the life of which she had filled so large a place A woman of remarkable ability and of unusual character, she made her influence felt both deeply and widely for good. The sermon preached on the occasion by Brother N. M. Ragland, pastor of the church, was a splendid tribute to her memory. Were it not for the crowded condition of our columns at t is season of the year, we should be glad to print the entire discourse. We can only, however, give brief extracts. Concerning her influence Brother Ragland said: "She was our oldest, best known, most beloved and highly respected citizen. Sixty-one eventful years she has lived and wrought in Fayetteville. She contributed more to the social, educational and religious upbuilding of the town than any other woman who ever lived in the place." Concerning her genealogy he said:

Her eyes first looked out on the strange world, in which she was to achieve so much and live so long, on the 15th day of March, 1815. She was the youngest and last surviving child in a family of fourteen—five brothers and nine sisters. Her father was Capt. George Robards, one of the youngest as well as the bravest soldiers of the Revolutionary War. He enlisted in April, 1777, when only a lad seventeen years old. He served as sergeant, lieutenant and captain. He was engaged in the battles of Brandywine, Monmouth, Stony Point, and was with General Lafayette amid the stirring scenes of Yorktown. After peace was made with England he raised a company to protect the frontier from Indians. His commission was signed by Thomas Jefferson, Governor of Virginia. At the close of his career as a soldier he located in Kentucky, where he lived to a good old age. He passed beyond his threescore years and ten. He was greatly loved by all men for his high character, his generous disposition and spotless integrity.

To her religious life he pays the following tribute:

While yet a young woman and before the Disciples of Christ had an organization in Fayetteville, she was converted and gave her heart to God in changeless love. She rode ten miles on horseback to obey the ordinance of Christian baptism. This was suggestive of the example of her Lord, who made the journey from Nazareth to the Jordan to be baptized of John. She was the last, save one—Mrs. Sarah Arrington—of the original members of the First Christian Church, which was founded by the young and gifted Robert Graham during his memorable meeting held in Fayetteville in the month of February, 1848. He says that Mrs. Stirman was one of the four saintly characters who constituted the nucleus of this church. She continued to grow in the confidence and the affection of the membership till the day of her death If she ever had a fault or an enemy, no mention was ever made of it to her pastor, who knew her intimately for the space of fifteen years. She did only good, and it is not strange that she reaped the same blessed fruitage. The town seems lonesome to many—both white and black—since she has gone. Her home was a veritable Mecca to which many people of all classes and conditions made frequent pilgrimages. All sought her counsel and advice. No heart, however hungry, ever came away empty. She was a woman strangely endowed, both in mind and heart. It is doubtful if the people of Fayetteville will ever see her equal.

The memory of such a life must be blessed indeed, and her surviving family and kindred are to be congratulated on the legacy they have in the memory of such a life and character. This is the kind of people that makes life seem worth living.

WONDERFUL CURES BY SWAMP-ROOT.

To Prove what this Famous New Discovery will do for YOU, Every Reader of the "Christian-Evangelist" May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Absolutely Free by Mail.

65TH POLICE PRECINCT, GREATER NEW YORK,
October 11th, 1900.

Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.:

GENTLEMEN:—In justice to you, I feel it my duty to send you an acknowledgment of the receipt of the sample bottle of Swamp-Root remedy you so kindly sent me. I had been out of health for the past five years with kidney and Bladder trouble. Our best physicians prescribed for me. They would relieve me for the time being, but the old complaint would in a short time return again. I sent for a sample bottle of Swamp-Root, and I found it did me a world of good. Since then I have taken eight small bottles purchased of my druggist, and I consider myself perfectly cured. I do not have to get up during the night to urinate, as I formerly did, three or four times a night, but now sleep the sleep of peace. My back is all right again, and in every way I am a new man. Two of my brother officers are still using Swamp-Root. They, like myself, cannot say too much in praise of it. It is a boon to mankind. We recommend it to all humanity who are suffering from kidney and bladder diseases.

My brother officers (whose signatures accompany this letter), as well as myself, thank you for the blessing you have brought to the human race in the compounding of Swamp-Root.

We remain yours very truly,

JAMES COOK,
HUGH E. BOYLE,
JOHN J. BODKIN.

Officers of the 65th Police Precinct, Greater New York.

Among the many famous cures of Swamp-Root the one which we publish this week for the benefit of our readers speaks in the highest terms of the wonderful curative properties of this great kidney remedy.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginnings in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work.

So when your kidneys are weak or out of order, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince you—and you may have a sample bottle free for the asking.

When your kidneys are not doing their work, some of the symptoms which prove it to you are pain or dull ache in the back, excess of uric acid, gravel, rheumatic pains, sediment in the urine, scanty supply, scalding irritation in passing it, obliged to go often during the day and to get up many times during the night to empty the bladder; sleeplessness, nervous irritability, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, puffy or dark circles under the eyes; sometimes the feet, limbs or body bloat, loss of ambition, general weakness and debility.

Swamp-Root is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

To prove its wonderful curative properties, send your name and address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., when you will receive, free of all charge, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a valuable book by mail, prepaid. This book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women who owe their good health, in fact their very lives, to the wonderful curative properties of this world-famous kidney remedy. Swamp-Root is so remarkably successful that our readers are advised to write for a free sample bottle, and to be sure and mention reading this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

Notes and News.

J. M. McQuerry, of De Soto, Ia., began work with the church at Shawnee, Okla., on Dec. 1.

J. W. Ball, formerly of Burr Oak, Kan., has succeeded Bro. Boyd in the pastorate at Belvidere, Neb.

A. B. Moore has closed his work at Macon, Ga., and is now residing at 3006 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo. He begins a meeting at Audubon, Ia.

Bro. S. Magee, Nevada, Mo., is available for protracted meeting work or the lecture field during 1901. Churches needing his services may address him as above.

B. F. Goslin has closed a successful year's work at Ariel and Perche, Boone county, Mo., and has received a unanimous call to remain with both congregations during the coming year.

The Year Book for 1901 is now in the hands of the printer. Any minister who wishes a change made in his address should notify B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, within ten days.

We have received a copy of the Litchfield (Minn.) Saturday Review, containing a sermon in full by Bro. W. H. Knotts. This is especially gratifying considering the weakness of our cause in Minnesota.

Albert Buxton is now on a trip to the southern part of Mexico, Yucatan and Central America. He is expected back at his pastorate in Hillsboro, Tex., the second Sunday in January.

R. F. Thrapp, of Pittsfield, Ill., has organized a Men's Social Union in his congregation with 60 members at the beginning. It is a good idea to put the men to work. The women always do their share.

Members of the Troy, Mo., Christian Church very kindly remembered their pastor, G. F. Assiter, at Christmas with a lavish donation of provisions, etc., which included several fine turkeys and a new carpet for his home.

C. E. Millard, who has been assisting as singing evangelist in the Warrensburg meeting, goes next to Little Rock, Ark., and then to the First Church at Omaha. Churches desiring his services must apply in advance.

The Christian Church at Springfield, Ill., of which J. E. Lynn is pastor, gave a New Century Christian Banquet on the evening of New Year's Day, to the pastors, elders, deacons, vestrymen and stewards of the Protestant churches of Springfield.

William Ross Lloyd has completed the fourth year of his pastorate at Richmond, Ky., during which time the church has had 200 additions, and has given $5,000 for missions and about $13,000 for all purposes. The present resident membership is 450.

The churches should begin to lay plans for the March offering for Foreign Missions the first Sunday in March. The Foreign Society will furnish all necessary supplies free of charge. The churches are requested to order at once.

Bro. Roy Hanley, formerly of St. Louis, and now a student in Butler College, called at this office during the holidays. He reports that both the college and the Bible College are prospering, and that between forty and fifty of the students are filling regular preaching appointments.

In our issue of Dec. 20 we announced, by mistake, that money for the Illinois State Bible-school work should be sent to A. C. Roach. Many may have already sent. Let those Illinois superintendents who have not yet sent a contribution to this work remember two things: First, remember not to forget to send it somewhere; second, send cash to J. P. Darst, Peoria, Ill., and pledges to A. C. Roach, Wyoming, Ill.

J. B. Lockhart and his wife, of Caney, Kan., were made the victims of a birthday surprise Dec. 17. To each of them was presented by the church a beautiful rocker. About forty gathered at his home with well-filled baskets, and spent the evening pleasantly.

The Foreign Society is in receipt of another gift of $600 on the annuity plan from a brother who had before given $2,000. The society is to be congratulated upon the record it is making. Annuities are better than bequests, and direct gifts are better than either.

On Dec. 22, L. L. Carpenter, of Wabash, Ind., dedicated the new house of worship at Leipsic, O. The weather was unfavorable, but the services were successful. C. M. Myers is pastor of the congregation. Twenty-five years ago Bro. Carpenter dedicated the old church in this town.

T. A. Hedges, of La Grange, Mo., writes that he knows two successful, scholarly, godly pastors, both in the prime of life and with families which are helpful, who would like to remove to Missouri. Both are now fully employed, one in Ohio and one in Nebraska. Address Bro. Hedges.

It is pretty generally known that about 3,000 000 acres of new land are to be open to settlement in Oklahoma the coming summer. If you think of securing a home in the new country send your name, address and occupation to Dick T. Morgan, Perry, Okla. He has something in view which may be to your personal profit, and may aid in establishing new churches in this new country. In writing, please refer to this notice or state you are a member of the Christian Church.

The new Christian Church at Pleasantville, Iowa, F. D. Ferrall, pastor, will be dedicated Sunday, January 13, 1901, 10 o'clock A. M. General Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Indiana, will preach the sermon. The new structure is commodious and modern, and will comfortably seat 700 people. It is heated by a No 7 auditorium furnace. It has a gallery, choir loft, choir room, pastor's study, lecture room, auditorium and basement. Cost, $7,000. Jan. 13 promises to be a great day in the history of Pleasantville Christian Church. The pastor has been with this congregation almost three years.

The Disciples' Club of New York held its third meeting of the season Dec. 18 at the Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn. F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C., delivered an address on "Our Place To-day." At the January meeting Edwin Markham, author of "The Man With the Hoe," will speak on "The Central Idea of Christianity." The work of the club is attracting wide attention. Besides its public meetings, it forms a working committee for the care of the common interests of the churches of Christ in New York—advertising city evangelization and all matters pertaining to the propagation of the faith.

Sunday, Dec. 23, the new church in Aboite, Ind., eleven miles west of Fort Wayne, on the Wabash R. R., was dedicated by G. E. Ireland, of Wabash. There has never before been a church building in the village. Some months ago Bro. J. H. Wingate went there without any financial assurance. Confronted by many difficulties, he pushed the enterprise steadily on, and, under all the circumstances, his work was nothing less than heroic. Holding services from house to house, and then in an old tile-shed, roughly fitted up for the purpose, he gathered a little band in membership and pressed on the work of building, doing much of the labor himself. The house is unpretentious on the exterior, but the interior is finished in artistic style. The citizens contributed liberally in material, labor and money, and the remainder was subscribed at the dedication.

Lameness in the muscles and joints indicates rheumatism. Don't dally with it a minute. Take Hood's Sarsaparilla and cure it.

Bald Spots

Without help, a bald spot never grows smaller. It keeps spreading, until at last your friends say, "How bald he is getting." Not easy to cure an old baldness, but easy to stop the first thinning, easy to check the first falling out. Used in time, baldness is made impossible with—

Ayer's Hair Vigor

It stops falling, promotes growth, and takes out all dandruff. It always restores color to faded or gray hair, all the dark, rich color of early life. You may depend upon it every time. It brings health to the hair.

$1.00 a bottle. All druggists.

"I have used your Hair Vigor and am greatly pleased with it. I have only used one bottle of it, and yet my hair has stopped falling out and has started to grow again nicely." JULIUS WITT, March 28, 1899. Canova, S. Dak.

Silas Jones.

Brother Silas Jones, whose portrait we present herewith, has recently accepted a professorship in the Biblical Department of Eureka College. He is a graduate of Eureka in the class of 1892 and spent two years in post-graduate study in Harvard University. During the past five years he has held the pastorate at Sterling, Ill., where he has gained a deep and lasting hold upon the affections of the church and community. The congregation was loath to let him go, but recognized that Brother Jones would find his widest field of usefulness in a professorial chair, where his influence could be exercised both directly upon the many young men who will study under him, and indirectly through them upon all the churches to which they will hereafter minister. He is to teach Hebrew and New Testament Greek and will give various other courses for the training of the ministerial students. The chair which he now holds has been occupied by Prof. B. C. Deweese, now at Lexington, Ky., and by Prof. Gilcrest, now of Central Christian College, Albany, Mo. It is an important post and he will fill it ably.

Congress of the Disciples.

The third annual congress of the Disciples of Christ will be held in Lexington, Ky., March 26-28, 1901. The program will soon be completed. It promises to be "the best in our history." The most conspicuous place will be given to the subject of evolution in its bearing upon religious and theological problems. One session will be devoted to the Psychology of Religious Experience, which is attracting so much interest at present. A new feature in our congress programs will be a reception on Wednesday evening, during which addresses will be given by representative women on "Women in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries." The third and last day will be given to topics suggested by the history and present work of the Disciples, such as "Christian Union," "The Church and the City," and "Missions." The committee in charge consists of F. D Power, chairman, H. O. Breeden, S. M. Cooper, R. E. Hieronymus, E. S. Ames. E. S AMES, Sec.

Needs of Nankin Christian College.

A job press of medium size, $50 to $80; a medium size paper cutter, $50 to $80; a medium size cylinder press, $200 to $400; English type, $100; Chinese type, $100; electrical apparatus, $100; library, any amount.

I shall feel that my visit home has not accomplished much if I am compelled to return empty-handed in the way of supplies for our school. China is about to be opened up as never before. There will be an increased and increasing demand for schools. It is not necessary for me to argue the importance of that kind of mission work in order to take our place in the forefront of the New China. There is no other way to hold our own against the great flood of anti-Christian teaching that always goes in with such revolutions as the one in progress in China. We are now on the ground and ready to continue our work, but we must have equipment. There is no reason why we should not publish the first newspaper in Nankin. It is a city of 400,000 inhabitants and has not a single newspaper. We have the only modern printing office in Nankin, and we can hold the first place if we go ahead at once. The school boys do the mechanical part of the work. The expense of running the establishment will be but nominal. We shall be able to give the students a good trade and accomplish untold good. At present we have a very small lever hand-press, an old-fashioned Washington hand-press for large work, about $150 worth of Chinese type, and $40 worth of English type. We have published thousands of calendars, tracts and pamphlets, and done a considerable job work in Chinese, besides publishing regularly three small mission periodicals in English. If we can secure the equipment the institution will be self-supporting and make some money besides. The last year I was in China, even with our very inadequate equipment, we more than paid our expenses. May we not hope that some of our brethren will see fit to invest in this enterprise? The society is not able to put out the money now, but if any one will buy the machines I am sure it will pay freight to destination. Type can be bought in China and Japan. If you prefer to send the money to me or Bro. McLean, I can make the purchases. If you prefer to buy the machines yourself, or have one to donate, let me know or forward to my address. I shall hope for a response to some or all of these objects. The presses and type are of first importance now. If you desire any further information please address me at Holden, Johnson county, Mo. I expect to return to China in the early spring.

I have met a large number of the brethren since I returned. I have attended ten state meetings, besides doing work in a large number of churches. I have not made many direct appeals for help. I told you of China and her needs. I am sure you believe I told you the truth. Will you not in this special way help us if you possibly can?

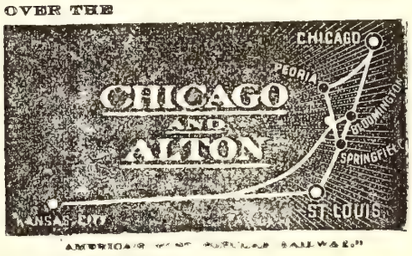
TOO MUCH

Exercise is as bad as too little for the growing girl. It is very easy for her to overdo, and this is especially dangerous at that critical period of a young girl's life when she crosses the line of womanhood. It is not an uncommon thing to lay the foundation for years of after misery by neglect of necessary precautions at the first "change of life."

The use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription not only establishes regularity, but it gives health to the entire womanly organism. It is the best medicine for diseases peculiar to women because it cures the causes of disease completely and permanently.



"Favorite Prescription" contains no alcohol, neither opium, cocaine nor any other narcotic. It cannot disagree with the most delicate constitution.

"For a number of months I suffered with female trouble," writes Miss Agnes McGowne, of 1212 Bank Street, Washington, D. C. "I tried various remedies, but none seemed to do me any permanent good. The doctors said it was the worst case of internal trouble they ever had. I decided to write to you for help, I received a very encouraging reply and commenced treatment at once. I had not used your 'Favorite Prescription' a week before I began to feel better, and, as I continued, my health gradually improved, and is improving every day."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, in paper covers, is sent free on receipt of 21 one-cent stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

A Missouri Moses Needed.

That St. Louis and other cities of Missouri are in the wilderness of lawless desolation, is manifest even to the wayfarer and stranger, but the Moses who will lead us out of the wilderness is the law-giver we are all yet looking and praying for. Some are hoping to find him in our new governor, others are hoping and praying that some God-commissioned and God-commanded member of the legislature may lead off in the making of such laws as may save us from further disgrace and disaster. The name of the man who can formulate a law that will forever eliminate the gambling adjunct and the scarlet annex from the legalized liquor saloon, will be immortal. The saddest feature of the liquor curse in England and Europe is the involvement of women on both sides of the saloon counter, as barmaids and bar patrons. Until the afternoon of the nineteenth century, America was largely exempt from this blight, but now our mothers, sisters, wives and daughters are being drawn into the maddening maelstrom by the thousand.

In the saloons combined with the grocery stores of St. Louis, little girls from 12 to 16 years are now retailing liquid calamity to older women as well as men across the counter. Very small children of both sexes are allowed to enter saloons and buy cans and buckets of liquor. Hundreds, if not thousands, of the homes of harlots have United States revenue license, and are recklessly selling all kinds of intoxicants, regardless of state or municipal laws. Any harlot who pays $25 can get a United States revenue license regardless of character. We have this information directly from the chief revenue collector in the custom house of St. Louis. A harlot may be under sentence to the penitentiary or just out of the penitentiary, but if she will lay down $25 and declare the place where and the time when she proposes to engage in her lawless and diabolical traffic, the United States officers will issue her license without a question or a word as to her character! Some of the most lawless saloons of St. Louis have had electric button or wire connection with all the way from one to two dozen of the homes of harlots, both running all the night of every day in the year.

The imperative need is a law to close every saloon in the state from midnight until six in the morning. It should be a penitentiary offense for any home of a harlot to have electric wire connection with a saloon, or any saloon to have electric wire connection with the home of a harlot. It should also be a penitentiary offense for intoxicating liquors to be sold in the homes of harlots. The business of a retail liquor saloon should be confined to the one counter or bar in one room only, without any tables, seats, music or accessories for assignation or gambling of any kind. The accursed wineroom should be forever eliminated, and no minor, either girl or boy, and no woman, either vicious or virtuous, should be allowed to buy, sell or handle intoxicating liquors in a saloon.

Whenever a saloon violates law, the license should be canceled, the keeper fined, imprisoned or both, and the premises, ground and building should be disqualified for saloon purposes for at least five years. This will force the landlord as well as the tenant to vigilantly regard the law under which the awfully dangerous and desolating business is allowed to do its deadly work.

If any reader of the Christian Evangelist in any county of the state can fix his eye or faith on a probable Moses, urge and encourage him to follow the guidance of the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

The twentieth century "down to date" Bible-schools will be graded, have graded lessons and the Bible will be studied systematically. You will see these changes, too, before the first decade passes.

Palmyra had one of its happiest moods during the Bible-school rally, and the Macdonald family have a way of infusing others with this same glad spirit, sending word to a servant of God, "Come right to our house," while Superintendent Glahn and Pastor L. J. Marshall were seeing to the minutiæ of the exercises. When at the night session Brother Marshall called for dollar volunteers to our army fund, twenty-five responded in ten minutes, and all in addition to the regular and standing pledge of the school.

Wishart, on the Kansas City-Springfield extension of the Frisco, is to have a first-class little house of the Lord. R. B. Havener put that spirit into the minds and hearts of the brethren.

The New London meeting was another manifestation of the work of the pastor, superintendents and teachers in co-operation with an evangelist, for many of the confessions came from the Bible-school work in the days gone by.

Central, St. Louis, just in our greatest time of need, comes forward with its pledge in full, $100. This enabled us to send the salaries to all the field force in good time for a "Merry Christmas."

When our schools are electing new superintendents and new teachers, why not begin the work of the year with an installation service, at which an address will be made on the responsibility of these who accept this part in God's work and the obligations of the other members to these whom the brethren think should serve in this holy part? Then have the congregation and the workers covenant in this service of God, one to be faithful and prompt in the work, and the others in their co-operation in every way.

RHEUMATISM

As experience stands, the most promising way to treat an old settled rheumatism is: to set up the general health.

Whatever makes health, in other respects, is good for rheumatism.

We don't say it will cure it. Sometimes it does; sometimes it don't.

Your chance is better with Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil than with anything else now known.

By and by there will be a sure cure; it will make a big noise in the world when it comes.

We'll send you a little to try if you like.

Hot Springs Home.

Many inquiries have reached me in regard to the Home here. The Home which is being planned will furnish our visiting brethren and those of other fellowships a Christian home while at this health resort and every dollar accruing from their stay here will go toward caring for worthy, destitute brethren. The Home is not being promoted for any local interest. It is for those who live elsewhere and who come here in quest of health; hence it is the home of the brotherhood. The present members of the Board of Trustees are T. Nelson Kincaid, Dr. W. H. Connell, F. F. Mace, Mrs. S. M. Howard, G. B. Cook and John G. Fletcher, of Little Rock.

The articles of incorporation are drawn up and will have been recorded before this is in print. The plan by which we hope to raise most easily the needed funds is an offering of $1.00 from each member and an offering from each church and Sunday-school. We will put an agent in the field in the interest of the Home. We hope to receive recognition by our state boards, and have representation on the state programs. It will take a great deal of time and labor for us to acquaint the brotherhood with the actual facts and the importance of this holy mission. Ever since this has been a health resort, Christ, in the person of his Disciples, has been hungry, thirsty, naked, a stranger and sick in the streets of this city, and we have not fed him, given him drink, clothed him, taken him in or visited him. Shall the Pythians build a $500,000 sanitarium and the Disciples of Christ leave their needy sick uncared for? We have noble and faithful men and women, and among them some of our most faithful preachers, sleeping in the pauper graveyard, who died here in want and neglect after they had spent their last dollar in quest of health. We are starting this work of mercy for you and yours and not for ours, and it is your work as well as ours.

California Letter.

The last Christmas of the century has departed. The day was all that Mother Nature could make it. The sun shone brightly in a cloudless sky. The breezes were sweetened by the breath of palms and lilies.

The curtain of the evening fell gently and the moon shone dimly through the gathering mist. Old Santa Claus left his sleigh and reindeers long enough to distribute many presents among the children in this land of flowers and sunshine.

Although far removed from the great heart of the nation and our brotherhood, we find humanity just about the same, with common sins, virtues, hopes and fears. It would seem that, as for natural resources, climate and beauty, Omnipotence could do no more than has been done for this land of the Golden West—the land of oranges, grapes, figs, prunes, pomegranites, olives, golden with the apples of Hesperides, festooned with roses and draped with lilies. Her greatest need is more Christ, less wine, less of ism, especially Romanism, and more men.

The public school system of California invites comparison with any other state or country in the world. Leland Stanford, Jr., University at Palo Alto and the State University at Berkeley are too well-known to need even a reference. If I am properly informed, the former is the most richly endowed institution of learning in the world. We probably feel a deeper interest in "Stanford," as it is only twenty minutes away.

When men are wanted in the faculty the universities of the East and Europe are picked. There is no want for money to meet every emergency, however great. There are seven or eight hundred students in this gigantic infant institution.

The Disciples have a small congregation at Palo Alto, one mile from the university grounds. They worship in a hall. They contemplate building. D. A. Russell, a gifted and excellent young man, who is a student at the State University and the Berkeley Bible Seminary, preaches for them.

Pres. Benj. Ide Wheeler, late of Cornell, is building up the State University very rapidly. Over twelve hundred students are enrolled.

The Berkeley Bible Seminary, of which Dr. Van Kirk is dean, is having a steady growth. The new dean is in close touch with Pres. Wheeler and the faculty, and frequently lectures before the students.

The growth of the seminary must of necessity be slow, but seems to be moving in the right direction to attain success.

Dr. Van Kirk will deliver an address before the Pastor's Union of San Jose, January 14.

The Bay District Convention will be held at the Central Christian Church in this city (San Jose) January 14th and 15th. A first-class program may be expected. The two churches of San Jose will provide fine entertainment.

Brother B. B. Burton closes his pastorate at the First Church with the year and century. He and his family leave many warm friends both in and out of the church. He expects to evangelize at least for a time. We understand that Brother Hazel of Eureka, Cal., will succeed him.

With the new century greetings to our friends who are visited by the EVANGELIST, we close, hoping to write more specifically of our Christian work in California in the future.

GOSPEL MELODIES

REVISED AND ENLARGED.

First Lines of Some of the Best Songs in this Excellent Book

Praise Him! Praise Him!
I love to steal awhile away.
Delay not, Delay not.
Softly and tenderly.
If God has riches given you.
Oh, I want to be still nearer.
Where the billows roll the highest.
There is a land beyond somewhere.
Oh, would to me were only given.
The Bible reveals a glorious land.
The voice of the Savior says come.
The path is set with many a thorn.
Oh, the love of God to me.
List to the song of the reapers.
Night with ebon pinion.
In the presence of our God we meet again.
Preaching Jesus on the way.
I ask not earthly treasure.
Oh, bless the Lord, Oh my soul.
There'll be room enough in heaven.
I am going to Jesus.
Broad is the road that leads to death.
There is a home, a beautiful home.
Attend young friends while I relate.
Peacefully lay her down to rest.
In thy name, Oh, Lord, assembling.
Toiling for Jesus day by day.
How sweet 'tis to know.
When our earthly life is ended.
Just beyond the shad'wy valley.
The Lord's our Rock, in Him we hide
Far beyond the rolling Jordan.
Lead me gently home, Father.
How firm a foundation.
Go on, you pilgrims.
Oh, how lovely! (Anthem.)
List to the voice of the Savior.
In our Father's home above.
There is one thought that cheers my way.
Make channels for the streams of love.
I've found a friend in Jesus.
It is the hour of prayer.
When storm-clouds arise in the sky.
I wonder if any poor sinner will come.
Oh, the wondrous love of Jesus.
See the ranks of sin approaching.
A thousand lords had gathered in the palace of Belshazzar.
Glory and praise to the Lord who died for me.
See! on the cross, the Savior bleeds.
There's a city of light 'mid the stars, we are told.
Just over the river are palaces grand.
Christians, are you growing weary?
There is a rock in a weary land.
O pilgrims, look forward to glory.
When the day is full of gladness.
There is a precious fountain.
Beyond the golden sunset sky.
Do you know a soul that's fainting?
Yes, we have a friend in Jesus.
Come now and let us reason.
When the waves are rolling high.
There is a house not made with hands.
Gone from our home.
I am on my journey to Canaan's happy land.
In thy temple, Lord, we gather.
Christ is knocking at my sad heart.
Let me sing the old song o'er again.
I will tell you an old simple story.
I'll rejoice in the love of Jesus.
There's a beautiful land far beyond the sky.
There's a hand ever ready to lift up all the fallen.
All for Jesus, all for Jesus.
There's a city that is far, far away.
When the trump of God shall sound.
Where are the ones we love fondly?
Teach me thy way.
God of our salvation.
Oh, there is joy in believing.
Praise Him, praise the name of God most high. (Anthem.)
Great is the Lord. (Anthem.)
One sweetly solemn thought.
Make a joyful noise unto the Lord. (Anthem.)
Hear the call to labor for the Lord.
Savior while my heart is tender.
Of the old time I'm thinking.
Twilight is stealing.
At home or away, in the alley or street.
Mother, tell me of the angels.

A Plea for the Prayer-meeting.

Adverse Resolutions by Kansas City Christian Ministers.

In a secular paper of the 20th inst.. I read: "The pastors of Kansas City Christian churches adopted a resolution to-day declaring it to be their sense that the mid-week prayer-meeting as it is now conducted has outlived its usefulness, and appointed a committee to outline a scheme for something better calculated to meet the needs of present-day church people."

A brother whose name is well known in the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is reported to have "declared that the age had outgrown the old-fashioned prayer-meeting. The best men's lives have now become so full of other things that they can not be induced to come out and spend an evening in prayer. . . . The prayer-meeting is a failure because it is not educative, does not appeal to men's social natures, and accomplishes nothing tangible and practical. The prayer-meeting as now conducted is a relic of a time when the negative and dreamy side of men's nature predominated in their religion. Their active, positive natures are now predominant and they demand something more practical."

Is it possible that stereoperfunctity has driven some of us to this view? Many of us are aware that the iron clad rules that prevail sometimes in some of our prayer-meetings—and which are more honored in the breach than in their observance—are calculated to produce just such results.

But a man should have larger charity in his heart than to allow such a view to gain permanent control over his mind. We are the very last people among professed Christians to give utterance to such sentiments.

Our brethren are already regarded as deficient in the duty of prayer. We not infrequently hear disparaging comparisons made between ourselves and others. Whether these comparisons are true or not, that others are more prayerful than we are, I do not now pretend to say, but of one thing I feel very sure—that there is room for improvement among us. There is no duty more clearly set forth and defined in the New Testament, and no duty better to begin with in the observance of a Christian life, than that of prayer. All of us, therefore, being honest in our inquiry after truth, need no scolding or fault-finding, but instruction, biblical instruction, upon this subject.

Possibly some think that instruction on this point is not needed, but not so with the Apostles and with Jesus. The Apostles exclaimed: "Lord, teach us how to pray, as John also taught his disciples." This humble request of the disciples, made to the Savior, does them great honor. There is nothing humiliating in asking for information. We are all sadly in need of instruction upon the subject of prayer. The object of every discourse in all of our churches is instruction and edification. To whom or to what source shall we go for our instruction on the subject of prayer? To the New Testament and to Christ and the Apostles.

The fact that Jesus prayed while on earth should be sufficient commendation of it to every one who would be as his Lord and Master. That he did so in the presence of men and again in solitude should admonish us of the propriety of "praying always, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting." Since he who was holy and without sin prayed, it should teach all of his followers that we can never become so holy or so engrossed in dispensing our charities, as is intimated above, as to render prayer unnecessary. It is the spontaneous utterance of every grateful and pious heart. Every true disciple of Christ delights in the exercise of this high privilege—the privilege of communing with and calling frequently upon his name.

The spirit of prayer arises from our feeling of dependence upon God for all the favors and blessings that we daily receive. Our happiness and even our existence is suspended upon a thousand small realities over which we have no control—and from the very nature of things can have none. Without the light, the heat, and genial influences of the sun we would all soon perish. And yet, as Pres. Milligan used to ask, "What mortal can guide the chariot of the king of day? What man can hasten the rising splendors of his coming, or stay for one moment the waning glories of his departure?"

The study of nature as well as of God's word causes us to feel our dependence on a higher power for life and happiness, and to cultivate the spirit of daily prayer. It is as natural to pray in the agony of pain, as I have witnessed in hundreds of instances, as it is to sigh, to moan, or to groan.

Nothing is more reasonable than the proposition of our Savior, that "men ought always to pray and not to faint"—or grow weary of it. He has taught us to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread," implying that we must pray every day. It is, therefore, the duty and privilege of every Christian to cultivate the habit of praying, at home, in the family, in the public assembly, and even in the busy scenes and conflicts of daily life. The spirit of prayer should flow as regularly and constantly from the heart of every believer as the spirit of love and gratitude.

While, therefore, the Christian—the follower of Christ—may pray everywhere and without ceasing, he should never forget his own closet nor his family devotions, nor the worship of the public assembly. In each of these there is a divine adaptation to the wants of our fallen nature. Let our prayer-meetings live, and let their attendance be multiplied a hundred fold, is the plea of

Your brother,
CLAYTON KEITH.

December 23, 1900.

[Bro. Keith's plea for prayer is eloquent and timely. We do not understand that the Kansas City brethren propose to abolish prayer but to introduce such changes in the mid-week meeting as shall make it a more edifying and genuinely prayerful meeting. There is plenty of room for improvement and if any good suggestion can come out of Kansas City we are willing to hear it. EDITOR.]

YOU can buy a chimney to fit your lamp that will last till some accident happens to it.

Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass" is that chimney.

You can have it—your dealer will get it—if you insist on it. He may tell you it costs him three times as much as some others. That is true. He may say they are just as good. Don't you believe it—they may be better for him; he may like the breaking.

Our "Index" describes all lamps and their proper chimneys. With it you can always order the right size and shape of chimney for any lamp. We mail it FREE to any one who writes for it.

Seven at Dieterich, all by baptism; 18 at Shiloh, 14 by baptism; 23 at West Salem, 15 by baptism None of the above have been reported. Just closed our meeting here last evening. Bro. R. J. Greencastle, Ind., Dec. 24.—One lady made the good confession last night at Cayuga.—L. V. BARBRE.

Bedford, Ind., Dec. 21.—I dedicated our new church at Heltonville, in this (Lawrence) County, last Sunday. It is a nice frame building, costing $1,500 and has a seating capacity of 300. All were happy on the occasion. Quincy Short offered the dedicatory prayer. Large audiences attended both the morning and afternoon services The debt on the church was nearly all provided for before the day of dedication, so that little begging was necessary. Bro. Short followed the dedication with a protracted meeting.—JAMES SMALL.

Fort Wayne, Ind., Dec. 26.—We have just closed a two weeks' meeting. Bro. W. T. Groom of Wabash, Ind., did the preaching. Bro. Groom is a good man and an able preacher, and his sermons accomplished great good. On account of the holidays we had to close, when our meetings had only begun. There were three accessions, two by conversion and one by statement.—J. A. HARRIS, pastor West Creighton Avenue Church of Christ.

Goffs, Kan., Dec. 24.—One added from the United Brethren at my regular appointment here yesterday. Held a short meeting for Bro. L. W. Myers in Powhattan, Kas. Four added; one confession.—L. H. BARNUM.

Pastors or evangelists desiring my aid for February and March may address me as above.—C. M. HUGHES, singing evangelist.

Oelwein, Iowa, Dec. 28.—On Dec. 24 closed a very pleasant meeting, held under auspices of State Board, at Platteville, Wis. While five accessions were the only visible results, it increased the little band more than 40 per cent. —J. H. STARK.

Barnard, Mo., Dec. 24.—Our meeting at Palestine closed with six accessions, three baptisms. I continue there for the fourth year. The church there pounded us so severely that we had to be hauled home in a wagon. But we are recovering. I will also continue with Salem church the third year, four additions there since last report.—F. E. BLANCHARD.

Plad, Mo., Dec. 27.—Closed my work here the third Lord's Day in December, 35 were added to the congregation during the year and three churches organized. Am ready for a call to another church. St. Louis, Dec. 24.—Closed a little meeting with the church at Pearl, Ill., last night with eleven additions. There are some splendid people at this point. I begin a meeting with the New Canton, Ill., Church the 29.—W. H. KERN.

—Warrensburg, Mo., Dec. 28.—Our meeting of three weeks' closed last Sunday with 43 additions. We have been benefited in many ways by the meeting. It was a spiritual meeting, The old first-principles-method was not used. The whole gospel was preached, but with the greater emphasis upon the Christ, and sin, and repentance. The quiet and reverential spirit over the large audiences from night to night was indeed impressive. Thirty-two of our additions were by confession and baptism. Our large seating capacity was taxed from first to last It was a meeting of the home forces. In 16 months' ministry here 160 have been added to the church, a large per cent. of this number by baptism. We have had two short meetings in this time, the first one with no outside help. This time C. E. Millard had charge of the music and gave his illustrated solo work. Our present evangelistic force of the true spirit and proper methods is too small for the needs of the field. Until it is adequately enlarged, our churches will do well to engage in home efforts. H. A. DENTON.

Deweese, Neb., Dec. 27.—We closed a good meeting at Courtland, Kan., Dec. 23, assisted by Bro. W. P. Jewett, the worthy pastor. Seven additions; four by confession, three from the Pentecostals. Bro. Jewett has labored with the Courtland Church for five years. He will close his labors March 1, 1901, much to the regret of his congregation. Any church wanting a pastor will make no mistake in selecting Bro. Jewett. We will dedicate our new house at Ox Bow Jan. 19 and follow with a meeting.—E. W. YOCUM.

The Army of Health

THE ARMY IN THE PHILIPPINES INSIGNIFICANT COMPARED WITH THIS ONE.

If all people in the United States, Canada and Great Britian who make daily use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets could be assembled together it would make an army that would outnumber our army of one hundred thousand by at least five to one.

Men and women, who are broken down in health, are only a part of the thousands who use this popular preparation, the greater number are people who are in fair health but who know that the way to keep well is to keep the digestion perfect and use Stuart's Tablets as regularly as meal time comes to insure good digestion and proper assimilation of food.

Prevention is always better than cure and disease can find no foothold if the digestion is kept in good working order by the daily use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Mr. Thomas Seale, Mayfield, Calif., says: "Have used and recommended Stuart's Tablets because there is nothing like them to keep the stomach right."

Miss Lelia Dively, 4627 Plummer St., Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "I wish everyone to know how grateful I am for Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I suffered for a long time and did not know what ailed me. I lost flesh right along until one day I noticed an advertisement of these tablets and immediately bought a 50 cent box at the drug store. I am only on the second box and am gaining in flesh and color. I have at last found something that has reached my ailment."

From Mrs. Del. Eldred, Sun Prairie, Wis., "I was taken dizzy very suddenly during the hot weather of the past summer. After ten days of constant dizziness I went to our local physician, who said my liver was torpid and I had overheated my blood; he doctored me for two weeks without much improvement; I finally thought of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets (which I had used long before for various bad feelings) and the first three tablets helped me. They are easily the best all around family medicine I ever used."

The army of people who take Stuart's Tablets are mostly people in fairly good health, and who keep well by taking them regularly after meals. They contain no opiates, cocaine or any cathartic or injurious drugs, simply the natural peptones and digestives which every weak stomach lacks.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists everywhere in United States, Canada and Great Britain.

Struggling Toward the Light.

By Walter S. Smith.

Timothy had written his long letter to his mother before he opened the Sunrise Blade. It was a marked copy. There was his letter on the front page. It was headed: "Now give us a rest! A traduced and injured young man asks only fair play. Let Sunrise gossips shut their spleen in, and attend to their own business! Read his letter! It is manly!"

These headlines extended a fourth of the way down the column; and then came the letter. Timothy had acknowledged that he wronged as good a man as ever lived at Sunrise or the Bend, and he told how he did it under the conviction that he must be loyal to his church. He had since learned better where true loyalty centers and was ready to render any sort of recompense that he should find available. But as to the accusations in the line of chastity, temperance and honesty, he indignantly denied every allegation. He would pray and work for the salvation of the souls of the two false individuals who had started them, but he would not rest under their aspersions, and, if repeated, he would expose publicly the cause of the calumniation in each case.

Besides the head-lines above quoted, the editor wrote an extended personal note. We will give an excerpt or two, just to show the vigor with which justice sometimes prompts a man to speak:

"TIMOTHY HENRY'S LETTER.

"There is a class of beings running loose in our streets whose own vile thoughts cause them to look maliciously on those who are cleaner than themselves. This young minister has lived with us, and nobody ever knew an unchaste act performed by him. The disreputable wretch who started the report of his drinking in the lumber-yard could easily have known better if he had only attended church, or been present at any of our temperance meetings. No minister of our town has hit our drinking dives more stinging blows than Timothy Henry. And the Vixen who has tried to make trouble between him and his wife ought to be heartily ashamed of herself. She well knows she has nothing against the young man, except that his wife thinks more of him than she does of the Vixen. Those who know them both are in no way surprised that such is the case. Whenever Rev. Henry wants to come to Sunrise he will find all true to him whose opinions are worth considering."

There were few accessions. The church building was maliciously spoken of as "unsafe;" the roll numbered only fifty-nine when the meeting began, and sixty-nine when it closed. People would not join a church so nearly dead, and the four weeks' effort was not a numerical success.

An example or two will show the reasons why some did not respond. One man whom everybody knew to be of no account, who had inherited and wasted a fortune, was quite regular in his attendance; and not unfrequently he was seen wiping the rain from his eyes. One evening in particular the sermon was thorough-going and persuasive beyond the ordinary. On the way home his wife asked him, "Why didn't you respond to-night?"

"I? I respond? Do you think I would respond to that sort of a sermon?"

"What was the matter with the sermon?"

"Why, it was sinners, sinners, sinners! Do you think I will answer when all the calls are for sinners?"

His wife was of course greatly surprised, and ventured to ask: "Don't you think you are a sinner?"

"No, indeed, I'm not!"

The poor wretch had been guilty of about all the catalogue of unclean and scandalous things, and as the basis of all his abominable conduct he had been criminally idle. Even now his wife was making a living for him on the sewing machine—and HE was not a sinner!

Another case. Paul found in one of the shops a man of high intelligence, whose wife was a Christian and whose children attended the Sunday-school. He contributed liberally to the Sunday-school and sometimes to the church on an extra occasion. But he was not a member; and he politely parried personal invitation. One day Paul asked him directly: "Mr. Richards, shall we not hope to see you take hold in the church?"

"No, I am not aiming to unite."

"Well, you are firm and frank. Will you tell me why?"

"I would rather you had not inquired; but as you have done so, I will answer. I do not want anything to do with Christianity. It has wrought too much sorrow in my life. I am its sworn enemy. What I sometimes do for it is out of my regard for Mrs. Richards."

"Well, friend, what can be the cause of so strange an oath? Tell me frankly."

"Let it be, then, as frank as you desire. My mother died insane; and it was Christianity that unbalanced her mind."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Indeed, I have no doubt of it. She was the most religious woman that I have ever seen. It indeed became a consuming passion with her."

"Did she get excited in revivals?"

"Yes, and I have known her to pray and sing all night; and, at times of especial interest, she would scarcely eat or sleep."

"Did she shout, and scream, and have paroxysms?"

"Yes. She has often become unconscious and as cold and rigid as a corpse."

"Well, you have named her ailment incorrectly. That is not Christianity at all; it is artificial excitement; and really it is a dangerous disease. But Christianity is healthful, and pure religion is a physical benediction. The Bible does not warrant those extreme violations of nature. In fact it rebukes excesses of all kinds."

No impression made, except to get a promise that he would come out and listen; he was "not afraid to listen." But on all occasions where special preparation was made for him, Mr. Richards was absent and the effort was lost.

Other cases could be given, but these will illustrate some of the difficulties in Paul's pathway. The few who did unite were humble people; and so it was considered a "poor meeting."

Timothy received another letter from his mother, this time as meek and quiescent as if she had never been disturbed. Here is an extract:

"I am truly glad you were not caught away by a whirlwind of excitement. You are undoubtedly sincere; and I cannot see that you are wrong. Father says there is 'a bushel of good sense' in what you said in your letter. He has heard these people preach, and he says they are hard men to answer.

"Go on, my son, and serve the Master as you have light; and may you greatly enlarge his kingdom by a faithful ministry! I confess that, if I were younger, I would feel inclined to go that way myself; but father and I will probably spend our remaining days in the old Third Church. God bless you, son! We are not grieving now.

"Lovingly,
"YOUR MOTHER."

It was now necessary that the work of the meeting be concluded, and directions given for the future of the church.

Timothy had made many friends, and they needed a resident minister. There was no objection to Bro. Portly, but only to what they called "railroad preaching." They were hungry for pastoral oversight. Paul had been regularly ordained in Kentucky and he believed in the ceremony; especially in the ordination of officers.

So he advised them first to fill the corps of officers and set them apart with fasting and prayer. At the appointed time, therefore, a presbytery consisting of Paul, Timothy and Bro. Portly, proceeded in a most impressive manner to perform this duty.

Uncle Reuben was ordained as elder, and a few others were associated with him as trustees and deacons.

The question now was as to settling a resident minister. Luzon needed stronger preaching than Timothy could do, and as it was within ten miles of Mr. Portly's home, he readily consented to give up Freedom Church and put that Sunday in with Luzon and Homo. This was agreed to by these churches, and Freedom agreed to receive Timothy Henry as resident pastor.

He agreed to work for $600; and these heroic people proceeded at once to raise it. The woman with the worthless husband subscribed three dollars a month. Reuben Stanley subscribed one hundred dollars. Brother Fussy did not like the change. He thought Luzon could "provide for the boy, as well as Freedom;" and Bro. Portly was his preacher any way. He therefore refused to put down anything; and supposed he was doing what his sister in Sunrise would approve. But she sent him the Blade with the letter and the editorial marked; saying, in a letter, that she was sorry for what she wrote before, that the mother-in-law was of unsound mind, that every one had something good to say about Timothy; and that she wanted to subscribe five dollars. The brother was not a man of bad impulses so he wrote down the pledge for his sister and twenty dollars on his own account.

Bro. Smith, who dwelt five miles from town, subscribed five dollars a month, and then handed the paper to his daughter. She read it over carefully, and signed fifteen dollars. Paul said: "Miss Jennie, why do you not have your father sign for you?"

"I'd as lief he would be baptized for me!"

Paul greatly admired this, but playfully asked: "He has the fifteen dollars to pay, does he not?"

"Indeed, no! I pay it myself; and it takes me all the year to do it."

"Well, for the benefit it will be to the evangelists who deal all the time with difficult problems, tell me how you manage it."

"I make butter, and sell eggs and feathers; and every month lay by a twelfth of this sum, not to be used any other way. This I can do with real pleasure."

Bro. Smith had also a married daughter who subscribed twenty-five dollars; and thus there came another hundred from one family—and that only a Smith family.

Writing in the December Ladies' Home Journal on "Jerusalem as We See it To-Day," Mrs. Lew Wallace notes that "there is a common lament that the shrines dear alike to Jew and Christian are in keeping of the Mohammedan. For a thousand years they have been guarded with reverence and decorum by armed officials tolerant of every religion. Were Palestine in keeping of American Protestants debasing our sanctuaries into eating-houses and concert-rooms I fear Gethsemane would become a park for picnics, and the Holy Sepulchre, the shrine of shrines, be made a hall for socials. Twenty rival sects worship there in peace and safety. Were the Turkish guard withdrawn there would be fighting with paved stones and consecrated candlesticks if other weapons were not at hand. The house that is now a house of prayer might be made a den of cooks. Perhaps 'tis better as it is."

After Christmas.

As a general thing affectionate fathers and mothers rejoice in the happiness of their children, but the rule has its exceptions.

"Is Mr. Smart at all given to drink?" inquired a merchant, anxiously, of his confidential clerk.

"No, indeed!" was the decided answer. "He never touches a drop. But what put such a suspicion into your mind?"

"Why I have noticed that he has been two hours late for the last three mornings, and he looks for all the world as if he had been on a regular spree."

"Oh, that's all right," said the clerk. "He gave his boy a drum for Christmas."—Youth's Companion.

Grandmother's Recipes.

Grandma is one of those who can mix and flavor and bake to perfection without the aid of a cook-book. She was born to her profession, not made for it by practice and discipline. But alas for her who hopes to copy grandma's recipes, for they do not exist, save in her own brain, and they could never be transferred to paper.

Not so long ago one of the granddaughters went over to the olk house with pencil and paper to take down some of the most valuable rules,' to make a cook-book of her own, and present copies to all the nieces.

Grandma was delighted to be asked. She sat down, smoothed her apron, folded her plump hands and said:

"Yes, dear, yes. I should admire to give you my receipts, every one of 'em."

"We'll begin with the simplest," said Dora, in a businesslike tone. "Apple sauce, now. Yours is better than anybody's. How do you make it?"

"Well," said grandma, genially, "I peel my apples nice, and quarter 'em and put 'em on the stove with a little water."

"How many apples?" inquired Dora. "How much water?"

That was a poser. Grandma looked at her in real distress.

"Dear me, child," said she, "I can't tell you that to save my life! Why, just take 'em to the pump and pump a mite on 'em."

"Well," said Dora, trying to approach the subject by a different road, "sugar, now. How much of that to a quart saucepan full of apple?"

Grandma looked at her benignantly.

"I just take the sugar-box over to the stove," said she, "and put on—well, what's required. Yes, dear, with my little scoop!"

The apple saure was given up for graver matters; but there, also, lurked kefeat. When it came to buns, grandma put in currants, but—how many?

"Oh, I don't know, dear," said she, easily. "Not many. Here and there a traveller."

Lamb broth she simmered "till it was done."

"When the goodness is all out 'o the the meat, child," said she, somewhat pityingly. "Dear me, you can tell that!"

Sour milk gingerbread is one of her masterpieces. Yet how much soda does she use to a cup of milk?

"Enough to sweeten it, dear," says grandma, "and make it rise real good. You'll know when you try it."

The interview was given up. Dora sat with idle pencil and useless paper, while grandma, quite unconscious of proving a disappointment, beamed through her glasses and discoursed on the ease of cooking properly, if one only gave one's mind to it. Then the dear old lady rose and went out to "get supper," a meal calculated to fill any inexperienced cook with envy to the brim.

Grandma could do it to perfection, but she could not tell how.—Youths' Companion.

Logical Listener.

Parson Franks, of Slowbury, was preaching with much fervor one Sunday morning upon the duty of doing with all one's heart and might whatever one finds to do, when he became conscious of a commotion in the pew of Widow Goldsmith.

That lady seemed to be engaged in animated conversation with her son Tom, a boy of nine, on whose coat she had a firm grasp.

As Parson Franks bent his gaze on them, the boy broke away from his mother's detaining hand, and started up the aisle. When he reached the foot of the pulpit he halted, scarlet-faced and gasping.

"What is it, my boy?" asked the minister, looking kindly down at him.

"Please sir," stammered the youthful Goldsmith, "I—I forgot to feed the hens this morning, hurrying to get ready for church. Shall I go home now, or wait until preaching's over."

Some of the congregation smiled, but Parson Franks continued to look down at his little parishioner with kind gravity.

"I think you'd better stay, as the sermon is nearly done, Tom," he said, "but I thank you for showing me that at least one member of my congregation understands what I'm saying."

Then Tom returned to his seat and the Widow Goldsmith was filled with reluctant pride.—Youth's Companion.

Illustrated Sermon.

Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.—1 Pet. 4:12, 13.

In a large foundry there was a great heap of rusty old scrap-iron that had been purchased from the "junk" dealers for a fraction of a cent a pound. The price paid was really more than it was worth, for it had no value in its present condition except a prospective one and that altogether in proportion to the useful articles that skill and labor could make out of it by recasting it.

There were wornout wheels and pulleys, old stoves and furnaces that had been damaged by heat, parts of machinery that had been superseded by more improved patterns, and broken castings of every size and description from a door hinge to the "fly" wheel of a great engine.

All was to go into the furnace together, and while the "setters" were placing the various patterns in the sand to make the molds into which the liquid metal was to be poured, the scrap-iron complained bitterly at what was to be done to it. Each piece of iron realized that it was to pass through a fiery ordeal, an experience they had all had before, and from the repetition of which they all instinctively and complainingly shrank.

The quaintest and crudest kind of an old lock did not see why, after its "long period of usefulness"—though it was an actual fact that it had not been serviceable for at least a quarter of a century—"it should be subjected to such a fiery trial." A grindstone crank, that had in some way been broken, showed its "grit" by protesting against the certainty of losing its identity in the superheated retort in which it was to be placed. The several pieces of an old fly wheel, that had expanded—with self-importance (?)—till it had burst, managed to get close enough together to express their deep sense of humiliation at being a part of "a common scrap heap," and that as such they must be cast into the fiery furnace. "How excruciatingly painful," exclaimed the fragments of an old, wornout typewriter, "must be the holocaust through which we must pass." And a wheel perfect in every respect except that a single cog had in some way been broken out of it, wished that it might be spared from the ordeal of fire to which it too was about to be exposed. There was not a piece of iron in the unsightly old heap that did not enter complaint, and they almost invariably referred to their former usefulness as a sufficient justification for their protests.

But the workmen were either deaf, or heedless, or wiser than the scrap-iron, for they went right on setting the patterns, and when everything was in readiness the iron was thrown into the furnace and was soon reduced to a molten state and the molds were repeatedly filled with it, and a large quantity and a great variety of beautiful and useful castings were made. Then the scrap-iron was ashamed that it had ever complained.

Application.

It may not be complimentary, but many who profess to be the Master's disciples are in some respects not radically different from the imaginary things attributed to the scrap-iron. They lie about in rusty, corroded confusion till something occurs to disturb them in their selfish contentment, when they complain bitterly.

Just as the old lock, some persons who have not been useful for a decade—if they ever were—when disturbed from their complacent self-congratulation over their past services in the church cannot understand why they should be visited by any such fiery trial. It seems difficult for them to realize that it is for the purpose of arousing them from their lethargy and indifference, and to give them new life and incentives to present activity. Past usefulness can not atone for present neglect of duty.

Fragments of "self-opinionated selfhood" that have resulted from thinking too highly of the antecedents of the personal pronoun in the first person, singular number, just as the fly-wheel was broken by running at too high a rate of speed, have to be recast in the mold of humility before there can be any further usefulness. It is a decidedly painful experience, but it must be submitted to. The heat of the furnace is intense, but necessary.

Whatever the explanation may be, it is a remarkable fact that those persons who have been most useful in any age and among any people have been "recast" many times by being caused to pass again and again through the fiery furnace of affliction, disappointment, temptation, tribulation, penitence, and re-consecration—experiences that have been exceedingly painful but pre-eminently profitable.

"Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you as though some strange thing happened unto you; but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy."

Phœnix, Ariz.

A London paper gives this story, which may possibly have a moral concealed in it for some one in our own country:

As a well-known London clergyman was recently ascending the steps to his church, an old lady requested his help. With his usual courtly grace, he gave the old woman his arm. On reaching the top step she halted breathlessly, and asked him who was to preach.

"The Rev. Mr.———," he replied, giving his own name.

"Oh, dear," exclaimed the lady, "help me down again! I'd rather listen to the endless grinding of a windmill. Help me down again; I'll not go in."

The minister smiled and gently assisted her down, remarking as he parted with her, "I wouldn't go in either if I weren't the preacher."

How Quick is a Wink?

Nothing is too slight to escape the scrutiny of the modern scientific student of the human body. Even the twinkling of an eye has due attention. Says Good Words:

No satisfactory determination has been made of the reason we wink. Some suppose that the descent and return of the lid over the eye serves to wash it; others that covering the eye gives it a rest from the labor of vision, if only for an inappreciable instant. This view borrows some force from the fact that the record of winking is considerably used by experimental physiologists to help measure the fatigue which the eye suffers. In another line of investigation Herr S. Garten has attempted to measure the length of time occupied by different phases for a wink. He used a specially arranged photographic apparatus and affixed a piece of white paper to the edge of the eyelid for a mark. He found that the lid descends quickly, and rests a little at the bottom of its movement, after which it rises, but more slowly than it fell. The mean duration of the downward movement was from seventy-five to ninety one-thousandths of a second; the rest with the eye shut lasted variously, the shortest durations being fifteen hundredths of a second with one subject and seventeen hundredths with another; and the last phase of the wink, the rising of the lid, took seventeen hundredths of a second more, making the entire duration of the wink about forty-hundredths, or four-tenths of a second. The interruption is not long enough to interfere with the distinct vision.—Classmate.

The Letter That Was Not Sent.

We had been school-mates, then room-mates while we taught in different departments of the same school. We really loved each other dearly. When we parted, promises were exchanged that faithful correspondence would be kept up.

Ah, how time flies! How duties multiply, and how pleasures dominate our use of time! Actually, when six months had passed since my friend's unanswered letter had reached my desk, after an unbroken correspondence through the few months immediately following our separation,—actually, I say, I was too ashamed to write. The promise had been broken by me. I had neglected to write promptly, then postponed writing until "a more convenient season," then there was no further excuse to offer but negligence. I loved my friend as dearly as ever; but would she believe it at so late a day? Once, indeed, I attempted to write, but the explanation was tedious and the bungling apology was put aside to await a more favorable mood.

At least eight months had come and gone since my dear friend had been heard from. Then a letter came from another, a common friend of both. It said:

"Was it not sad that Lilian died so far away from us? She went West for her health, which had been failing for a long time. As you were such close friends, no doubt you wrote to each other regularly, so I need not enter into particulars."

This news gave me a great shock. My faithlessness seemed little short of criminal. It was almost more than I could bear to know that my dear friend had been ill without any comforting word from me, to know she had died and thought me untrue. With aching heart I tremblingly wrote a letter of condolence to her brother, touching pathetically our past relationship, my broken promise and my present grief.

By quick return of mail came a reply from Lilian herself. It was like a voice from the region beyond the grave. It was hard to tell which hurt me most, this quick revulsion of feeling or the startling news that first shocked me. A false rumor had caused that first letter to be written. The second letter showed my friend to be enjoying perfect health and high spirits. As she laughingly wrote, she was still looking for the letter that had not been sent. The whole affair taught me a salutary lesson, which is repeated here in the hope that some other person with a letter to write will make haste and write it.

Good Manners at Home.

Practical jokes are rarely indulged in by persons of nice perceptions, and teasing passes the bounds of good taste when it ceases to be a matter of pure fun on all sides. Inquisitiveness is always bad form. "Whom is your letter from?" "What makes your eyes so red?" are interferences with one's rightful privacy. A closed door should be respected and give assurance of seclusion.

One who is so disloyal as to repeat to any outsider, however intimate, anything to the discredit of the family, deserves to forfeit all family rights and privileges.

There are no terms strong enough to condemn the vanity of parents who will allow a daughter's charms, prospects and advantages to be advertised in the public prints.

Society requires that whatever their private relations, husband and wife face the world as a unit, harmonious and with interests identical.

One thing good form imperatively demands—that by no mischance, no loss of self-control, shall family discords be revealed to strangers, children or servants.

An uncontrolled voice is always unmannerly and undignified.

A readiness to give up in little things is the most tactful appeal possible for a return of courtesy at other times when the matter may be of importance to us.

A man of letters who visited Washington recently appeared at but one dinner party during his stay. Then he sat next to the daughter of a noted naval officer. Her vocabulary is of a kind peculiar to extremely young girls, but she rattled away at the famous man without a moment's respite. It was during the pause in the general conversation that she said to him: "I'm awfully stuck on Shakespeare. Don't you think he's terribly interesting?" Everybody listened to hear the great man's reply, for as a Shakespearean scholar he has few peers. "Yes," he said, solemnly, "I do think he is interesting. I think he is more than that. Aaron Burr's Magnetism.

"From the time the beautiful and brilliant Madame Jumel had been a young girl, and when Aaron Burr was only a Captain in the American army, she had been more than once under the spell of his strange fascination," writes William Perrine, in the January Ladies' Home Journal. "Burr had introduced her to the celebrated Margaret Moncrieff, had desperately flirted with her, and had implanted within her an admiration which was still alive when he was an aged social exile. She had written of him in earlier days that he appeared to her to 'the perfection of manhood,' that his figure and form had been fashioned in the mould of the graces, and that he was as familiar with the drawing-room as with the camp. 'In a word,' she said, 'he was a combined model of Mars and Apollo. His eye was of the deepest black and sparkled with an incomprehensible brilliancy when he smiled; but if enraged its power was absolutely terrific. Into whatever female society he chanced by the fortunes of war or the vicissitudes of private life to be cast he conquered all hearts without an effort; and until he became deeply involved in the affairs of State, and the vexations incident to the political arena, I do not believe a female capable of the gentle emotions of love ever looked upon him without loving him.' Wherever he went he was petted and caressed by her sex, and hundreds vied with each other in a continuous struggle to offer him some testimonial of their adulation. Subsequently Madame Jumel was married to Burr, who was nearly eighty and she nearly sixty. The marriage was not a happy one, and the two soon separated."

Russell Sage on Economy.

No matter how fast a man may make money, he owes it to society as well as to himself to be economical.

Any young man who will live up to the following set of rules will get more genuine happiness out of life than his neighbor who violates them.

Out of every dollar earned save twenty-five cents. Save seventy-five cents if you can, but never less than twenty-five.

Get up at a regular hour every morning, and work until the things that are before you are finished. Don't drop what you have in hand because it is five o'clock.

Be honest; always have the courage to tell the truth.

Don't depend on others. Even if you have a rich father, strike out for yourself.

Cultivate independence at the very outset.

Learn the value of money. Realize that it stands, when honestly made, as the monument to your value as a citizen.

Be jealous of your civic rights. Take a wholesome interest in public affairs, but do not let politics, or anything else, interfere with the rigid administration of your private duties. The state is made up of individuals.

Be clean and decent. Don't do anything that you would be ashamed to discuss with your mother.

Don't gamble.

Be circumspect in your amusements.

In connection with amusement, I have never been able to understand why the young men of to-day deem the theatre an absolute essential in seeking diversion. An evening with a good book is, or ought to be, more satisfying to the young man of brains than an evening in a hall where a lot of make-believe characters are strutting up and down the stage, like children at a masquerade. When the human race reaches its highest mental development there will probably be no theatres.—Russell Sage, in Saturday Evening Post.

"Now children," said a St. Louis teacher to her class, "What was it Queen Victoria said at her coronation?" "Is my crown on straight?" replied one of the small girl pupils.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale has given three rules which have been the greatest help to him in life. They are: Be in the open air all you can; rub against the rank and file daily; and every day hold intimate conversation with a superior.

PETE.

VII.—How Pete Escaped.

Edgar Brown had passed a lonesome day. He had prevailed on the hotel-keeper to give Lucifer a box for a sleeping-apartment, and three meals of scraps a day. In the morning he had gone with the dog to the woods, and once more he had examined that lonesome spot by the branch where blood had been dropped upon the stones. He wondered how the dog had known about it, and what had happened there, and he tried to persuade Lucifer to lead him farther into the mystery. But Lucifer could only put his nose close to the rocks and howl. So they came back to town, and having shut up the dog in his kennel, Edgar sought the tramp. The day passed by and he did not once catch a glimpse of Nap. He made a few cautious inquiries; nobody had seen the tramp. When four o'clock came he knew school must be "out," so he put a pretty collar upon Lucifer and he led him toward Miss Dollie Dudley's, hoping he would find Linda May and give her a chance to speak to her dog. When he came in sight of the house, there was Linda May just going into the yard with her books. And there stood Miss Dollie Dudley, with a tiny plantain in her hand which she had just pulled up out of her bluegrass. She caught sight of Edgar and then of the dog; that dog which had broken her glass pitcher, chased a cat into her house, and caused Linda May to get a whipping! She looked at Lucifer and he stopped and tried to back, drawing the cord tight by which he was held. Edgar tried to persuade him to go along just as if nothing had happened. But Lucifer, with his eyes on Miss Dollie's face, flattened himself on the sidewalk till he looked like a doormat. Miss Dollie said nothing; she just glared at him. The young man found he could not advance, so he turned about looking very red and embarrassed and went the other way. When he had turned the corner, Miss Dollie squatted down and began looking to see if there was another hated plantain in her precious grass. Her lips were drawn tight together, and occasionally she lifted her head and darted her eye to see if that dog and that peanut-man (it was thus she thought of Edgar) were trying it again.

As Edgar walked along despondently he saw Madge, Jennie and Mrs. Morris. He had never met any of them but Madge, and he spoke to her heartily. She said, "How-d'e do" just as if she wasn't glad to see him; and she wasn't. If you will say "I don't care," you will get the very tone of voice in which Madge said, "How-d'e do." It depressed Edgar. Wasn't there anybody in the world he could get to like him? He was sadder than when he used to mope about his sweetheart. At that time, he didn't want anybody to like him, and he didn't care for anything. The girl who had taken the moonlight boat ride with him, and who—but never mind; anyway she hadn't married him, and that had made him rather enjoy having the blues. Now everything was different, and he said to himself (bitterly) that even Lucifer would leave him if he wasn't tied by the collar! So he came to Mrs. Morris' house and suddenly he heard a voice calling his name. He looked up and discovered Pete at a second-story window at the side of the house. "Come in here," she called, "I want to tell you something!"

It seemed too good to be true. Edgar's heart grew light at once. He led Lucifer into the yard and stopped under the window. Pete wasn't a very pretty little girl. You say, Why put her in your story, then? Why, I'm going to put her in just as she is. Who cares whether she was pretty or not? Jennie, her oldest sister, was beautiful, with the sweetest smile and loveliest hair,—and Jennie hasn't done anything in this story to make it interesting; you know that, yourself. No, Pete wasn't pretty, but her face had the shrewdest look when she wanted to be wise, and the most cunning little lift of the mouth when she was laughing, and she had a way of rolling her eyes when she wanted to tease,—which was pretty often,—and she was just full of little gestures and capers and nimble thoughts. Edgar liked Madge better,—or thought he did,—because Madge was so quiet and ladylike, when she wanted to be, and so pretty,—almost as pretty as Jennie; and she had a deep look in her eyes; and she wasn't friendly to him,—which only made him more anxious to get to be her friend. But Pete amused him more. If those children had only known what Edgar Brown was really after. Oh, I wonder how they would have acted? I'll tell you. We have seen that he was a very rich man with no near kin. Well, and he had made up his mind to give a large sum of money to one of these girls, because he knew their mother was poor and had a hard time. At least, if he could make sure that Mrs. Morris was the kind of woman he thought her, and if he could decide which girl he would rather have the money,—money that would educate her in a fine college, with some change left over. He had found out that Letitia's father and Linda May's aunt had as much money as was good for them. And it would make him happy to give some of his wealth to a girl that he had learned to love. Would it be Pete or Madge? or—but not Jennie, for she was too old. He didn't care for young ladies any more. They reminded him too much of that sweetheart that was now somebody else's wife.

"Oh, Mr. Brown," said Pete, "Mama and Madge and Jennie have all gone away and locked up the house with me in it! And I'm so hungry I am just like my little savings-bank."

"Your savings-bank?" repeated Edgar.

"Yes, it's hollow. And Mr. Pendleton's new ladder is leaning against our apple-tree right there, and please put it up here to the window so I can climb down. We borrowed it to get the high-up apples and Jennie hasn't taken it home." Mr. Pendleton was Letitia's father, who lived next door.

"Of course I will!" cried Edgar heartily. "But it was too bad for them to lock you in, thinking you were gone somewhere! If I hadn't come along what would you have done? I'm some use, after all!" And he leaned the pretty yellow ladder against Pete's bedroom window. Pete came down like a squirrel. "Now, le's hurry," said Pete. "Come on. Ever'thing's locked up but the summer kitchen but they's a barrel of salt there and we'll get it and sail to the garden and eat tomatoes and cucumbers and everything. But they's no time to lose."

"I don't understand the need for such hurry," panted Edgar as he followed Pete on the run to the garden. She held her apron filled with salt, much as if she were going forth to salt cattle.

"Oh, don't you!" cried Pete, rolling her eyes. "If it had been you locked up 'cause you was bad, and not to be let out till morning, I guess you'd understand the need of such hurry! Get those ripest ones, and then come and sit in the grape-arbor where we can just throw out our arms and grab all the grapes we want, without getting up."

"Pete, do you mean they locked you up on purpose?"

"It was intentional," said Pete gravely, as she buried her mouth in a large tomato and came out looking red and juicy. "But you needn't be scared. They've gone to visit Miss Dollie and they always stay an hour at least, and this is just a few minutes. And after awhile I'll scoot up the ladder and you'll put it back where it was and take Lucifer away, so nobody will ever know what you have done."

"But, Pete, this isn't right. And if I had only known——"

"Yes, that's what I thought, that's why I didn't tell you at the time. But I won't tell on you, Mr. Brown, you needn't look so unhappy. And oh, oh, look! Mr. Pendleton has come and carried away his ladder. Oh, what will we do, now?"

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY PHILADELPHIA

Publishers' Notes.

The large four-story building, occupied entirely by the Christian Publishing Company, is being wired for electric lights. Our business has so increased of late that more or less night work is necessary in order to keep up with orders. For the past few weeks every department of the business has been running at high pressure. Our press-room contains seven cylinder presses, all of which have been running at their highest speed. Sacks of mail and packages of express matter leave the establishment by wagon-loads. All of which goes to show that our patrons are giving substantial evidence of their appreciation of our efforts in their behalf.

Alexander Campbell's Theology, by W. E. Garrison, is having a rapidly increasing sale. In a recent issue of The Christian Century, of Chicago, a number of our leading preachers, responding to the editor's invitation, gave lists of the six best books they had read during 1900. Almost every list contained Alexander Campbell's Theology, followed by a few adjectives in the superlative degree. This book is, without question, a very valuable contribution to our literature, and no intelligent student of our cause should neglect to secure and read it. Price $1.00.

We still have on hand some copies of the Memoirs of Gen. W. T. Sherman. This is the standard, best life of the great soldier, and is a most interesting narrative of his experience in California in the early days of that state, of his career during the Civil War, and of his later experience up to his death. It is a large, handsome, finely printed and bound volume, which was published to sell for $2.00. We offer it, postpaid, for seventy-five cents.

Every week that you delay sending for The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901 is so much lost to you. The Commentary contains the International S. S. lessons for the entire year. If you do not order it until the 1st of February, you lose the benefit of its help for one month. If you are superintendent, teacher, officer, or advanced pupil in the Sunday-school, you owe it to yourself and to those whom you instruct, to secure this book—easily the best of all S. S. "helps." For many years it has occupied this place, but the volume for 1901 is brighter and better than ever before. The price, one dollar. We might print it on inferior paper, put it in cheap, flimsy binding, and sell it cheaper, but we believe our patrons would rather pay a dollar, and have a book that will last the entire year, and then be in good condition to put on the shelf and serve as a valuable reference book, than to save a few cents and get a book that would come to pieces before the year was half gone.

It will pay you to carefully examine the various book advertisements in this issue. You cannot afford not to take advantage of some of the splendid offers we are making. We have inaugurated a new era in book-making, book-selling and book-buying among the Disciples of Christ, and we look to those who are thereby benefited to respond to our efforts.

Seeds that Surely Grow.

The cost of seeds compared with the value of the crop is so small that a few cents saved by buying second rate seeds will amount to many dollars lost when the harvest is gathered. Farmers have found out by many costly failures what a risky thing it is to buy seeds without being pretty sure that they are reliable and true to name. The latest catalogue of the seed house of D. M. Ferry & Co., of Detroit, Mich., is a reminder that thousands of farmers in the United States and Canada have pinned their faith to the reputation of this great firm. During a business career approaching half a century in time Ferry's seeds have won an annual increase in popularity, which is perhaps the best evidence that they grow and give satisfaction. Ferry's Seed Annual for 1901 is a useful guide in selecting seeds for the farm, the truck garden and the flower garden. It is sent free on application.

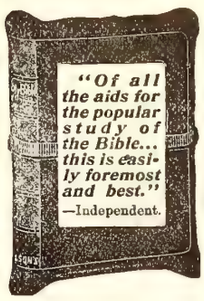
The Triumphal Entry.*

The Sabbath was past, that Sabbath on which the feast in Bethany and the anointing of Jesus had occurred. Another morning had dawned and it was the first day of the week, the day which was to be made forever notable at its next recurrence by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. At this time, on the 10th of Nisan, the Passover lamb must be chosen by each family, to be sacredly set aside for the coming feast. It was fitting that he who was the Lamb of God about to be offered up for the sins of the world should be on this day formally set apart for that sacrificial purpose. Jesus, therefore, makes his entry into Jerusalem in such manner as to confirm the already cherished intention of his enemies to kill him. Heretofore he had declared his office and mission rather in response to their questions and accusations. Now he would proclaim himself in such wise as could not be misunderstood.

A great throng poured along the road between Bethany and Jerusalem, following the broader and easier way that skirted the southern side of the Mount of Olives. A little distance from Bethany lay the small village of Bethphage, perhaps a furlong off from the public highway. Jesus sent two of his disciples there, telling them that they would find at a certain place an ass and her colt tied, which they were to bring to him. If the owners or bystanders questioned their right to take these animals they were simply to say, The Lord hath need of them, and it would be sufficient. They found it as he had said, and the owners, Luke tells us, were satisfied with their explanation. Happy would it be if we were ever ready to give up our possessions or use our talents in response to the simple message, "The Lord hath need of them." There would be no lack of means or workers anywhere if we would heed this sacred appeal.

The mother was brought with the colt, it is likely because of the fact stated, that the former had never been ridden before, and would therefore more quietly submit if attended by the mother than if alone. Upon this young ass, therefore, whose first service was rendered to the Lord of glory, to whom the first and best of all is due, the disciples spread their garments and seated the Master; and the procession at once wended its way toward the sacred city. The King is coming unto his own, but will his own receive him? The Messiah is approaching the holy hill of Zion. Shall he find there a throne or a cross? He leaves no room for misconception of the spirit of his coming. He is riding, not on the stately and proud war horse, but on the meek and lowly ass, the emblem of peace. He bore no arms and wore no armour. He was followed by no mail-clad warriors, and not a single shield or spear flashed in the rising sun. His robe was not of purple, but the modest hyacinth-colored talith of the rabbi. "His head was bare. It wore no crown but the touch of the Passover sunlight." His followers were peasants and fishermen, with a few modest women in their midst, and of children not a few. They carried palm branches in their hands, and their aspect was not the fierce one of war, but the joyous one of peace and human brotherhood.

What a wonderful triumphal procession was this! How absurd it must have appeared to the eye blinded by dreams of earthly glory. In the words of old Matthew Henry: "The outside of this triumph was very mean. He rode upon an ass's colt, which made no figure. This colt was borrowed. Christ went upon the water upon a borrowed boat, ate the Passover in a borrowed chamber, was buried in a borrowed sepulcher, and here rode upon a borrowed ass. He had no rich trappings, but only the garments of others." Yet this conqueror, poor and mean in earthly estate, was attended by such a retinue as never before waited upon the steps of king or warrior. No spoils of fields and villages, in shape of gold or rich garments or gangs of slaves; no cringing captives, whose crowns were replaced by chains—his trophies were those of love and mercy. The lame whom he had healed now ran and leaped before him. The dumb whom he had given voice were chanting the praises of God with happy hearts. The blind whose eyes were now open drank in the beauty of that spring morning and ever turned from nature's charms to look once more into that face which was the first to greet their restored vision, and which evermore would seem to them as the face of the good God himself.



The marvelous cavalcade had not gone far on its way till it was met by a vast crowd of pilgrims coming out from the city and its environs towards Bethany. John says that the story of Jesus' purposed visit to Jerusalem had reached these people, and they hastened forth to keep him company. Most of them, doubtless, were from Galilee and Perea, where thousands of the people believed on Jesus, and of whom many were expecting that the Master would now declare himself the Messiah and consent to assume his rightful place at the head of the nation. When they met the procession and beheld the figure of Jesus riding in the midst of the crowd, some of them might have recalled the words of their prophet Zechariah, who had described the coming of the national deliverer in this very manner. But the impression was but faint, and John tells us that it was not till after Jesus ascended into heaven that his disciples felt the full significance of this scene. But their hearts were lifted up with a strange exultation, and they spread their garments and the branches of trees in the road before him and hailed him with words that were never uttered by Israel except in expression of their Messianic hope. When the Pharisees asked him to rebuke his disciples for this use of Scripture which they were unwilling to apply to him themselves, he answered, "If these shall hold their peace the stones will cry out." And after nineteen centuries, though the unbelieving Moslem rules over the land that was our Savior's earthly home, yet every stone in the streets of Jerusalem, and every path and hill and spring and ruin in Palestine cry out in testimony of Jesus, until they become, even to the unbeliever, the "fifth gospel," confirming the testimony of the other four.

A short journey brought the procession around the southern spur of the mountain, and Jerusalem the golden burst upon their view. The cheers of the multitude burst upon the air, but those nearest the Master heard his sobs of grief, and the words of bitter lamentation, in which he pictured the unbelief and coming desolation of the city. Passing down the western slope of Olivet, crossing over the valley of Kedron by a bridge, and entering through the gate now known as St. Stephen's, the multitude found themselves in Jerusalem. Jesus at once entered into the temple, and no such sincere and saintly worship was rendered that day by anyone as rose from the heart of him whom enemies were even then plotting to destroy as a blasphemer and malefactor. Within these sacred precincts a host of busy and irreverent traffickers were pursuing gain with no thought of the worship going on around them, and within the courts of the temple, but a few paces distant. Two years before this the Lord had driven these men from the sacred courts but they had soon found their way back again. Once more he expelled them, though he needed not this time to use, as before, a whip of small cords. His indignant countenance and burning words were enough to awe and affright them and the place was soon quiet of the tumult. Why can we not learn, what Bro. Procter was so often wont to tell us, the spiritual lesson of this incident? Take Jesus into your heart and let him abide there and he will drive out the evil thoughts and desires that have made it filthy and profane, and make it in very truth what it was meant to be—a sanctuary.

Emboldened by the presence and manifest power of Jesus, the afflicted pressed about him, and he again enjoyed the bliss of healing them. The dear children, whose hearts are ever, when unperverted, attuned to praise, caught up the song they had heard on the way and made the temple vocal with the song, "Hosanna to the Son of David!" Again the Pharisees objected, and again the Lord met them with the highest sanction that could be given, the declaration of their inspired Psalmist, who had declared the most acceptable worship to be that coming from the pure and unsullied soul of a little child. The issue was now clearly made. This prophet of Nazareth would not be silenced except by death. Death, then, it must be. Henceforth one object is before his enemies. They will find some pretext of securing his condemnation by the Roman authorities, and thus his rising power be suppressed. Blindly they go on their way of sin, which God shall overrule to the glory of their victim and the salvation of the world that knew him not.

TOPIC FOR JANUARY 13.

God wants the old. He will probably not reject the services of those who come to him in the sear and yellow leaf, or when the almond tree has begun to flourish. Perhaps he does not refuse those who offer themselves at the eleventh hour. But God most especially wants the young, whose arm and heart are still strong and elastic. He wants their young brain and brawn and sinew; he wants their youthful spring and vigor; their hope and exuberance, their boundless enthusiasm. Before yet they are disillusioned; before they can say "we have tried all that and find it vain;" before the world has to them lost its variegated hues and taken on the dull lead color of prosaism; before they have lost faith in men and in the might of that great Power that rules in the affairs of men to do large things; God wants them.

There are many with whom the almond tree never flourishes in the heart, with whom enthusiasm, exuberance, hope, faith never die. These have drunk of the fountain of perpetual youth, and these, of course, God wants; for they are young. But most of us begin to crystallize, after a time, to become "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." For most of us, therefore, it is needful to come early in our experience to a remembrance of our Creator and to devotion to him.

Some contend that the great things of this world are done by the young; that the great world conquerors, the Alexanders and the rest, have been young men; that the great movements in national and political life, the great achievements in human affairs have been executed, if not planned, by young men. Old men for council, young men for action. If this be true, how important for that young initiative and executive power to be consecrated!

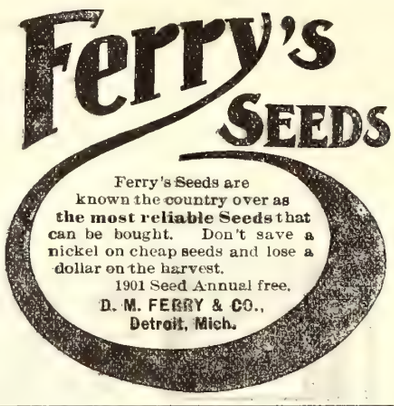
I was riding on a train thirty-five minutes late one day, when I asked the brakeman, "Shall we make up the time and catch the other train at the junction?"

He promptly replied, "No. We shan't make up any time."

"Why not?"

"Wrong man on the box in the engine! Too old. When you want to make up time you must have a young engineer, young fireman, young conductor and young brakeman—then you'll make up time!"

"Yes," I replied, "and perhaps ditch the train?"



"Sometimes, mebbe! But then you'll make up time, all the same!"

There's something in what he said. However much youth may lack caution and have a tendency to smash things, it nevertheless makes things go. And if that energy and enthusiasm be consecrated, filled with a high purpose and kept back, therefore, from presumptuous and reckless sins, what a progress can be made!

Think of the great enterprises being carried on to-day into which young men are throwing tremendous vigor! Not all of their achievement is wasted. Thank God that much of the so-called secular enterprise is filled with high motives and sings the praise of God. It is a glorious thing to see a vigorous, enthusiastic man or woman at work. And how especially inspiring if that work be calculated to bless and benefit mankind and so to praise God.

Let no man despise thy youth, said Paul to the devoted Timothy. If, however, that youth had not been consecrated it might have been impossible to preserve it from reproach. Let no one despise our youth, indeed; but let us be very sure not to make that youth despicable. If at any time we serve unworthy ends, fall from the high purposes we have set before us, then have we no right to claim Timothy's immunity from contempt. Let the youth be what it should be—consecrated!—and then will none despise it.

GRAY.

Mrs. Albina Gray was born April 29, 1821, near Georgetown, Ky., and died at Nevada, Mo. Nov. 17, 1900. She was the daughter of John Cumberland Snell. When three years of age, she removed with her father's family to Boone County, Mo. She was married to Prof. W. W. Hudson of the State University of Missouri, Feb. 25, 1841, by Elder Thos. Allen, a well-known Christian preacher. Of this union five children were born, two sons, Walter P. Hudson, of New York city and Prof. Jas. S. Hudson, of Nevada, survive her. Prof. Hudson died July, 1859. She was married to Judge H. P. Gray, of Pettis County, Mo., April 18, 1867. They removed to Vernon County in 1869. Together they breasted the storms of life, together enjoyed its sunshine till the Father called him to higher service, leaving the wife to be tenderly cared for by her sons. For 61 years "Aunt Biny," as she was familiarly called, was a Christian in deed and in truth. By her regular attendance at church, hospitality in her own home and substantial aid to the cause of Christ, she proved her faith by her works. In her beautiful Christian life she has left an imperishable treasure to those who mourn her loss.

The world is poorer by the loss of such lives, but they go to make heaven more glorious.

Precious are the memories of dear Aunt Biny. L. E.

MOORE.

J. N. Moore was born in Ohio, March 8, 1828; died in Joplin, Mo., Dec. 19, 1900, aged 72. In early boyhood he moved from Ohio to Crawfordsville, Ind. In the fall of 1867 Mr. Israel Patton led an emigrant party of ten wagons to south-west Missouri. They settled at what is now known as Fidelity in this county. Deceased was a member of that party. For 25 years he lived at or near the old home place. For eight years he has lived with his only surviving child, Mrs. J. P. Boss, in this city. For 45 years he was a member of the church. He was an upright citizen, devoted father, patient sufferer and devoted Christian. He read his Bible and our church papers constantly and was well informed. Services were conducted at the home, 224 Jackson Ave., on Dec. 20 by the writer. Interment in Fairview cemetery.

NICKELL.

Mrs. May Amelia Nickell died at her home in this city, Nov. 18, 1900, aged 24 years, seven months, four days. Dec. 15, 1899, we buried Ardanelle, two years old. Nov. 12, 1900, we buried Charles Calvin, five days old and last the mother, who is now with her babies. A lonely, desolate husband, parents, a brother and three sisters sorrow, but with hope. Sister Nickell had been a faithful member of the church for eight years. She was modest but tender and sympathetic. She had a place in the Bible-school and Endeavor society as well as the regular services. Her death seems unspeakably sad and untimely but we believe that "God doeth all things well." Services were held by the writer, Nov. 19. Interment in Fairview cemetery. W. F. TURNER.

DR. PRICE'S cream BAKING POWDER

Is a pure baking powder—
no alum, lime or ammonia.

No acid but that from grapes —which is pure, pleasant and healthful—enters into Dr. Price's Baking Powder.

Fruit acids are accounted by hygienists the most important of the elements of the food of man, and of these the acid of the grape is most prominent.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is not only the most efficient and perfect of leavening agents, but owing to its constituents is likewise promotive of health.

NOTE.—There are many cheap baking powders made of alum. Liebig, the celebrated chemist, says that alum disorders the stomach and causes acidity and dyspepsia.

The Preacher's Library.

"What books should the preacher have in his study?" is a question often asked, especially by young preachers, and one frequently discussed in the religious press and at our conventions and ministerial institutes. As a matter of course, the question cannot be given a complete answer. No man, however learned and wise, can make out a full list of the volumes another man should read. No two men have the same mental need and capacity, and a book that is profitable and helpful to Mr. A may be entirely useless to Mr. B.

And then, too, the preacher's library should not be confined exclusively to works on religion and theology, but should include the best secular literature—poetry, fiction, history, biography, science—that the preacher may not become a one-sided man. We might readily supply a list of first-class works in each of these departments of literature, but we would not say to any man—"These are just the books you ought to have; these, all of these, and only these." Individual tastes vary, and every man must judge for himself.

But there is one section of the question that we can, with confidence, answer directly and specifically: What books of the distinctive literature of the Disciples of Christ should every preacher among us buy, carefully read and read again, and keep in his study for consultation and reference?

It goes without saying that the works of Alexander Campbell should occupy a conspicuous place among the books of every preacher among the Disciples of Christ. While Campbell's teaching is not binding upon us, it should ever be remembered that he it was who built, through the swamps of traditionalism and sectarianism, the safe and solid highway upon which we now walk. He will be known in history as the foremost religious teacher of the century which has just closed. No preacher can fully comprehend the genius of "our plea" for primitive Christianity and Christian union without a careful reading of the works of Mr. Campbell.

With the works of Campbell should be placed "Alexander Campbell's Theology," by W. E. Garrison, a book which is a scientific statement of the religious and philosophical influence which molded Mr. Campbell's theological teaching, and the "Life of Alexander Campbell," by T. W. Grafton, a popular, concise biography of the "Sage of Bethany."

For the sake of brevity we must content ourselves with merely listing a number of works without attempting to explain or demonstrate the especial value of each book.

The Care of All the Churches, Thos. Munnell.
Types and Metaphors of the Bible, J. W. Monser.
The Scheme of the Redemption, R. Milligan.
Missionary Addresses, A. McLean.
Origin of the Disciples of Christ, G. W. Longan.
Studies in Acts, W. J. Lhamon.
People's New Testament, with Notes, B. W. Johnson.
Jesus as a Teacher, B. A. Hinsdale.
Men of Yesterday, T. W. Grafton.
The Old Faith Restated, J. H. Garrison.
Alone with God, J. H. Garrison.
Half Hour Studies at the Cross, J. H. Garrison.
The Divine Demonstration, H. W. Everest.
America or Rome, J. L. Brandt.

To this list we would add the following pamphlets:

Frequency of the Lord's Supper, N. J. Aylsworth.
Christian Science Dissected, A. D. Sector.
Sabbath or Lord's Day, D. R. Dungan.
Letters to Bishop Morris, J. M. Mathes.
Higher Criticism, J. H. Garrison

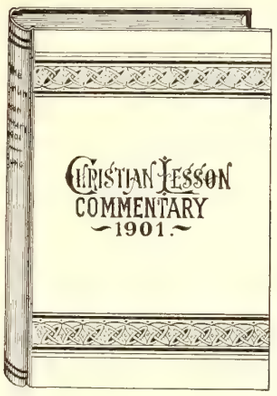
We do not at all mean to say that these books are all a preacher should have, or that these are sufficient for him. What we do say is that, whatever else he may have, every Christian preacher should have these books.

There is hardly a preacher among us, we suppose, who does not possess a few, at least, out of this list. There are thousands, however, many of whom will read these lines, who are lacking many of the volumes. These should at once make good their deficiency. This they owe to themselves and to the people to whom they minister.

"That is all very well," sighs some preacher, reading these lines, "but how can we get the books? I want them, but that list would cost me $30.00, and how do you expect a poor preacher to raise $30.00?"

Exactly! It would be a very difficult thing for the average preacher to expend $30.00 for books at one time. But we can fix that all right. Listen! You have some of those books already—$10.00 worth, perhaps. The rest of them will cost you $20.00 down and $2.00 per month until the balance is paid, and this you can do easily. If you choose you can make the monthly payments larger and so pay out quicker. Think over this proposition and then write to the Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, about it.

Another thing: In the list given above are twenty-five large volumes bound either in cloth or leather and eight pamphlets. The total cost is only about $30.00. We do not believe that an equal number of the standard works of any other religious body can be obtained so cheaply. We feel, therefore, that we are succeeding in our purpose to make it easy for our people to obtain good literature.



PERFECTLY HEALTHY people have pure, rich, warm, nourishing blood, good appetite and good digestion. Hood's Sarsaparilla gives these, and thus it makes people healthy and keeps them so. Get only Hood's.

THE

THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY, by W. W. Dowling, is the very best Sunday-school "help" published for Superintendents, Teachers and Advanced Pupils. It includes practical expositions of the International Lessons for 1901, numerous maps, chronological tables of the Life of Jesus and of the Old Testament, a Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names, with their pronunciation and meanings, blackboard designs, numerous illustrations, etc., etc. If you are a Sunday-school teacher you owe it to yourself and to those whom you teach to equip yourself with the very best helps, and the best help, after the Bible, is THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY. This book is handsomely and substantially bound in cloth, stamped with black and gold. It is now ready for delivery. You should secure your copy in good season, that you may prepare for the first Sunday of the New Year.

Every active, working Christian should have this set of tracts. He should read them for his own good, and then place them where they will do the most good. The purchaser of this set is getting a great deal for a very little money.

A SUGGESTION:—If you say to yourself, "As soon as I go to the postoffice and get a Money Order, I will send for these tracts," you will probably forget all about it. Suppose you write your order immediately, put a one-dollar bill in the envelope, and send it along. Teere is not one chance in ten thousand that the money will go astray.

THE CAMPBELL LIBRARY

TEN DOLLARS TIME PAYMENTS

This is an offer that we deem worthy to start off a new year and a new century. During the year 1900 we sold a great many sets of Alexander Campbell's Works, but we know that there are yet thousands of persons who should have these books who have not yet secured them. It is to these that we now appeal. To the set of Campbell's Works we have added two volumes (see list below), which naturally belong with The Campbell Library. The price of Campbell's Works is $8.00. By adding these two volumes the price is made $10.00—thus permitting The Campbell Library to be purchased on the Instalment Plan. The Library contains the following works:

The Christian System.
Popular Lectures and Addresses.
Lectures on the Pentateuch.
The Christian Baptist.
Evidences of Christianity.
Living Oracles.
Christian Baptism.
Campbell-Purcell Debate.
Letters to a Skeptic.
Life and Death.
Sermon on the Law.
Life of Alexander Campbell.
By T. W. GRAFTON.
Alexander Campbell's Theology.
By W. E. GARRISON.

Three of the works are pamphlets; all the rest are splendid volumes, bound either in cloth or leather. The price that we ask is very low for such books. Until a few months ago Campbell's works sold much higher. We made a substantial cut in prices, that the works might have a larger circulation.

EASY TO BUY. Any person who desires the Campbell Library may easily secure it. Any person favorably known to us, or who can give good reference, may purchase it by paying $2.00 down and $2.00 per month for four months. If you wish to take advantage of this plan notify us, and we will send you an agreement to sign. When you return the agreement, with first payment of $2.00, we send you the books, prepaid.

THE
Christian Lesson Commentary—1901

THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY, by W. W. Dowling, is the very best Sunday-school "help" published for Superintendents, Teachers and Advanced Pupils. For many years our leading Sunday-school workers have chosen it in preference to all others. The volume for 1901 is better than ever before. It is a handsome volume of 429 pages. It includes practical expositions of the International Lessons for 1901, numerous maps, chronological tables of the Life of Jesus and of the Old Testament, a Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names, with their pronunciation and meanings, blackboard designs, numerous illustrations, etc., etc. If you are a Sunday-school teacher you owe it to yourself and to those whom you teach to equip yourself with the very best helps, and the best help, after the Bible, is THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY. This book is handsomely and substantially bound in cloth, stamped with black and gold. It is now ready for delivery. You should secure your copy in good season, that you may prepare for the first Sunday of the New Year.

Current Events.

Ship Subsidy Bill. The ship subsidy bill is being pushed for passage in the present session of Congress, and it is reported that the numerous amendments which it has received have strengthened its chances. It has been discovered, it is said, that the labor interests are in favor of it, while the opposition comes largely from free-traders. Our merchant marine may fairly be classed as an infant industry. For one reason or another the building of cargo vessels in this country has proven so little profitable that only ten per cent. of our exports are carried in American-built ships. The arguments in favor of granting a subsidy to American vessels engaged in foreign trade are precisely those for the protective policy toward any young and needed industry. But there are two arguments against a subsidy which cannot be urged against a general protective policy: First, a protective tariff produces revenue for the government, whereas a subsidy calls for an expenditure to be met by general taxation; second, the granting of a special subsidy in the interest of a special industry establishes a dangerous precedent and one which may easily lead to corruption and jobbery. It would be unwarrantable, and we believe untrue, to say that Senator Frye and the others who are active in advocating this measure are actuated by any but the purest motives; but it is a fact, nevertheless, that the granting of such special privileges is a temptation to some and a menace to all. Even protectionists will admit the danger which is inseparable from the protective tariff and that danger is multiplied in the granting of a subsidy, while the latter is open in a far more serious sense than the former to the criticism that it taxes the many to provide for the few. Before approving the passage of so dangerous a measure, even in the interest of so worthy a cause, we would be glad to see a more serious and exhaustive study of the real causes of the unprofitableness of our merchant marine hitherto.

Our Commercial Supremacy. It is a fact which has often been commented upon in American papers that our manufacturers are making such inroads upon the markets of the world that their competition has become a serious menace to their British and German rivals, who have hitherto held the field. But there has never hitherto been such a frank and general admission of this fact on the part of the rivals themselves as in the forecasts and retrospects on the occasion of the beginning of the new century. Leading journals and leading writers in Great Britain have pointed to the recent successes of American competitors in securing contracts in foreign markets. Their only error is in describing as a menace for the future what is an accomplished fact of the present. A generation ago our own home market was yet to be conquered, and our infant industries plausibly pleaded for protection to enable them to hold their own against the invasion of foreign products. Later we began to compete successfully in fields foreign alike to ourselves and our rivals, and American manufactured articles as well as agricultural products began to find their way into Asia and Africa. As a third step in our commercial expansion, we are now competing in the home markets of our rivals. The London and Brighton railway buys American steel rails and we send coal to England —though not yet to Newcastle. There is every reason why this should be so, for we have three essential elements which make for commercial success. We have inexhaustible quantities of raw material for the most important manufacturers. We have the cheapest labor in the world -not the lowest paid, but that which, considering its efficacy, its speed, its ability to handle tools and machinery, gives to the employer the largest return for each dollar of wages. And we have from our two coasts access to the markets of the world to a degree which cannot be matched by any other commercial power, and the construction of the isthmian canal will double this advantage. In the eighteenth century we won independence; in the nineteenth we mastered our own territory; in the twentieth we shall develop commercial supremacy.

Quay. It begins to appear probable that Mr. Quay will receive from the new Pennsylvania legislature the senatorship which the last one denied to him. At a Republican joint caucus, Quay was unanimously nominated with 123 votes. This is four less than the number required to elect in a joint ballot of the two houses. There are still many Republican members who stand out against the election of Quay, but no candidate has been even suggested who can possibly unite the opposition. In the recent campaign, candidates for the legislature were classed as Quay men or anti-Quay men, and about this personal issue the contest centered. The fact that the Quay men have won in the organization of both houses of the legislature, electing their president of the Senate and speaker of the House, indicates a Quay victory. It will be a dark day for the political honor of Pennsylvania when Matthew Quay, with his record for corrupt practice and dishonest dealing in public life, again becomes one of her representatives in the United States Senate.

Missouri Legislature. The Missouri Legislature is again in session and decent people have occasion to congratulate themselves on the prospect that Jefferson City will not be the radiating center for such a stench of political corruption as it was during the last Assembly. The personnel of the present Legislature is admitted on all hands to be a large improvement. Apart from a general venality and for-sale-ness which characterized the former body, its record was marred by the passing of two unrighteous laws: the Nesbit election law, which is a little faithful copy of its sire, the Goebel law, and the St. Louis Police Bill, a "job" of the most flagrant sort. The new Assembly starts out much better. The first bill introduced in the Senate is for the taxation of all corporate franchises, both domestic and foreign, doing business in the state. It is a question whether the method of assessing the value of franchises as proposed in the bill is just, but the principle is correct. The call for such a law was a plank in the Democratic state platform. New York has already had a similar law for two years.

New Governors. During the past week the newly elected governors in several states have formally taken their gubernatorial seats. January 1 is a favorite day for inaugurations. On that day Mr. Roosevelt, busy at his official desk until the last moment, turned over the affairs of the state of New York to Gov. Odell. He will, therefore, have a vacation of a couple of months, so far as politics are concerned, before entering upon his vice-presidential duties. In Michigan Mr. Pingree handed over the insignia of office to his successor, Mr. Bliss, giving him along with his welcome, a warning that the rich corporations doing business in the state would attempt to corrupt him. Gov. LaFollette of Wisconsin and Gov. Yates of Illinois have also assumed their new duties. A spirited contest for the speakership of the Illinois House has been virtually won by Judge L. Y. Sherman.

Kruger in America. The rumor about the time of Mr. Kruger's landing in Europe that he would later make a visit to America proved to be premature and unwarranted. Within the last few days a more authentic report to the same effect has gained currency, and it appears not improbable that some time during the present year we may have the pleasure of welcoming the venerable statesman to our soil. Perhaps the failure of his project of enlisting the European Powers in behalf of his South African compatriots, impels him to seek assistance in the United States as a last resort. It is scarcely to be expected that he will be moved solely by climatic and hygienic considerations, but rather by the hope of substantial aid. If this be his expectation, Mr. Kruger should read the history of former attempts to secure the intervention of this government in such cases. Fifty years ago Louis Kossuth, the exiled Hungarian patriot, visited the United States to secure aid from our government in the struggle against Austrian oppression. The cause of the patriotic Hungarians commanded a unanimous sympathy in this country very unlike the divided approbation which a half (more or less) of our people give to the Boers, and Kossuth received a personal ovation, the like of which has never been given to any foreigner except Lafayette. Yet when he asked for the aid of the government, he was informed that it was not our policy to take sides in European disputes. Mr. Kruger may as well profit by this example and save his steamer passage. He will, however, if he comes, be sure of a warm personal reception.

South Africa.

The week in South Africa has been marked by a revival of the Boer raid in Cape Colony and continued threats of risings of the Cape Dutch. Martial law has been extended to six new districts of Cape Colony. A detachment of Gen. Knox's men has been defeated near Lindley with a total loss of forty. There are faint fore-gleams of a policy of conciliation on both sides, that the British will no longer demand unconditional surrender, and that the Boers will accept limited independence. At Pretoria Gen. Kitchener addressed an assembly of prominent Boers who have surrendered and the tone of the meeting was one of compromise. In general, it is becoming fairly evident, even to the inflamed partisans in the front on both sides, that complete victory must be for one party difficult and costly, for the other impossible. If the Boers will consider the examples of free and self-governing Canada and Australia they will know that Great Britain does not wish to conquer them to oppress and rob. Australia and Canada also have gold mines. And if Great Britain will remember how large a measure of liberty she has conceded to these two great federations, surely she will not find it inconsistent with the dignity and substantial integrity of her empire to guarantee, even before the close of hostilities, a measure of self-government to the Boers. There has long since ceased to be any motive to the continuance of the war, on the British side, except the maintenance of imperial prestige, and the indefinite prolongation of the conflict will in itself defeat this end. Now is the time for the men of sense and backbone on both sides to bend their vertebræ—that is the chief object for which a backbone is constructed with joints and cartilage and not like a ramrod—concede a few points to each other and make peace.

Lord Roberts' Return.

The arrival of Lord Roberts in England was the occasion of such a demonstration of welcome as has been accorded to few returning conquerors. It was in the class with the welcome of the first Duke of Marlborough in the time of Queen Anne and of the Duke of Wellington after Waterloo. Lord Roberts was first received by the Queen at Osborne on the Isle of Wight. An earldom was conferred upon him and he was decorated with the Order of the Garter. At London he was received cordially by all the royalty that could be assembled, with the Prince of Wales at the head of the line, and there was an immense popular demonstration. There can be no question of the unbounded affection which the British army and the British populace entertain for Lord Roberts. The returned general is not taking a vacation, but has gone to work promptly in the War Office. He predicts that the South African war will continue for some time, but expresses perfect confidence in General Kitchener's ability to manage it.

Australian Federation.

On the first day of the new century, the united commonwealth of Australia came into existence. The project of federating the several colonies of Australia was broached long ago, and about two years ago the British parliament took action authorizing the assembly of a constitutional convention. This convention outlined a scheme of government not greatly dissimilar to our own federal government, the chief difference being that the Governor-General is appointed by the crown. In the practical workings of its new constitution, Australia will probably enjoy even a much larger measure of independent self-government than Canada. Already the island continent has been the birthplace of several reforms in the machinery of self-government, notably the Australian system of balloting. On January 1, the Earl of Hopetoun was inaugurated as Governor-General and a ministry of six members was sworn in. Each of the federated colonies, except Tasmania, is represented in the ministry. New Zealand is not yet included in the federation. It is expected that the new ministry will favor the adoption of a protective tariff. There is every reason to believe that a new era of prosperity, dating from this colonial federation, will crown the already marvelous development of this land. We publish elsewhere in this paper an article by a distinguished Australian on the development of Australia.

Affairs in China.

In so promptly issuing the edict accepting the demands of the Powers as embodied in their joint note, the Dowager Empress apparently did not wish to be taken too seriously. The representatives of the Powers, though gratified by the edict and surprised by its promptness, pressed upon the Chinese plenipotentiaries the necessity of signing the agreement. Moved by the representations of Chang Chih Tung, one of the two assistant envoys, who pointed out the danger of permitting the destruction of the coast forts and the maintenance of legislation guards, the Empress commanded Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching not to sign the note until some radical changes had been made. In reply, they reminded her that her edict committed the Chinese government to the acceptance of the terms. It is reported that they have decided to sign in spite of her protest, and will place themselves, if necessary, under the protection of the Powers. The value of an agreement signed in disobedience to the express command of the Empress may well be questioned. The death penalty has been inflicted upon the Chinese soldier who, in obedience to the command of his superior officer (who, in turn, was doubtless moved by a command from the court), was guilty of the murder of Baron von Kettaler, the German Ambassador. German guards were present and many of the allied troops witnessed the execution, which was publicly performed by the Chinese herdsman. It is generally admitted that in no civilized country would the death penalty have been inflicted upon a soldier who had committed such an act under orders, but the responsibility would rather have been referred back as nearly as possible to its source. A blood-spattered Chinese herdsman is a strange agent to be used by the Christian Powers for the regeneration of China.

West Point Hazing.

The reputed death of a West Point cadet on account of injuries received in the process of hazing has occasioned a long-drawn-out official investigation and much talk wise and otherwise. The investigation is not yet finished and, until the evidence is all, in it is perhaps not discreet to pronounce a judgment on this particular case. The claim that Cadet Booz was attacked with pulmonary trouble, which had a fatal issue, as the result of drinking a few drops of tobasco sauce, was the starting point for the investigation, and the evidence so far has shown that such an effect could not follow that cause. In general, it is apparent that the alleged hazing atrocities are far less serious than the sensational press, both secular and religious, has tried to make out, and the probability is that the hazing of this particular cadet had nothing whatever to do with his death. And yet, since the publication of testimony to this effect, certain papers, ostentatiously zealous for a humanitarian reform, have continued to allude to the sad fate of the cadet who was "killed by hazing." A reform is never helped by such reckless distortions of the truth and we regret to see a much-needed reform like this hampered by the injudicious exaggeration of its advocates. There is no question but that hazing is a bad thing. Although it is not infrequently attended with salutary effects upon the one hazed, its principle is all wrong. The brutalizing effect upon the hazer and the sense of self-importance which the practice confers upon upper-class-men are more serious as a rule than the temporary inconvenience to which the hazed is compelled to submit. At its best it is a method of correction which does more harm to the corrector than good to the corrected. At its worst it is a form of cruelty and cowardice which may lead to serious results. It ought to be stopped, not only in our military and naval academies, but in all other reputable institutions.

The United States Senate has ratified a treaty, originated by Belgium and accepted by nearly all civilized governments, to protect the natives of Africa against intoxicants and has accepted the Lodge resolution in favor of other laws and treaties for the protection of all child-races, according to the recommendation of the President in his last message. The Gillett bill, extending the same protection to the New Hebrides, is now pending.

The Disciples of Christ in the Twentieth Century.

It is a time when the spirit of prophecy is upon many who are taking upon themselves to make forecasts of what is to be in the various departments of our complex civilization during this wonderful century which has just begun. It has seemed good to us, also, to prophesy and to give a forecast of the probable course of development of that religious movement in which our readers are deeply interested, and which has made such remarkable progress during the century which has just closed. In stating what will likely be the features of our growth and development during the coming century, we shall be stating also what we believe ought to be, for our faith is that what ought to be sooner or later will be. The scientific doctrine of "the survival of the fittest" is true in the realm of religion, in the kingdom of the spirit, when the "fittest" is understood to mean the truest and that which is in closest conformity to the will of God. To doubt the ultimate triumph of righteousness is the worst form of atheism.

It would seem safe to prophesy a very large numerical increase during the century. It is not likely that the present rate of increase will be kept up throughout the century, but there seems no reason to doubt that our growth shall continue to be in excess of other leading religious bodies of the country, as long as the conditions remain, relatively, as they are at present. The element of virility in the movement is most strongly marked. It has upon it the dew of its youth. It is characterized by a most remarkable hopefulness as to its future triumphs. These in themselves are elements of power which mean not only self-perpetuation but self-propagation and rapid growth. In addition to these elements of power, there are to be considered as abiding factors in the problem of our future increase, the following characteristic features of the movement: (1) The catholicity of the position of the Disciples in pleading for Christian unity on the basis of the simple creed of the New Testament, a non-partisan name, and obedience to Christ as the law of Christian fellowship. (2) The restoration of the New Testament method of evangelization, and (3) zeal in pressing directly upon men the claims of Christ and urging an immediate decision. These have been mighty elements of power in the past, and they are likely to remain so in the future. Men are losing confidence in the efficacy of human creeds and are growing more and more restless under their limitations. A movement which discards them as bases of fellowship, and offers all the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, is bound to attract thoughtful men increasingly as the spirit of liberty and catholicity increases. Moreover the clear, rational process of conversion, as exemplified in the New Testament, is seen to be in harmony with the needs of human nature in the light of the latest and best psychology. The religious body that is truest in its practice to the method of conversion illustrated in the Acts of the Apostles, other things being equal, is bound to excel others in winning men to the standard of Christ, and therefore in its numerical increase. On this ground we feel safe in predicting a continual rapid growth for the Disciples of Christ during the twentieth century.

While we feel sure that the Disciples will continue to emphasize those features which have made them successful in recruiting the ranks of the church militant from the world, we are equally sure that certain improvements will be made in the work of evangelization among us, which will render more permanent the results of our evangelistic efforts, and therefore, in the long run, will increase our numerical growth as well as bring about other not less desirable results. Passing out of the combative period, when certain doctrines and commands were largely emphasized because they had hitherto been largely neglected or repudiated, our movement in the future will lay greater stress upon the internal or spiritual side of conversion without neglecting those external features which have hitherto been kept, perhaps, abnormally prominent. The outward confession of Christ, the ordinance of baptism, and the identification of baptized believers with local churches, will all nave their proper emphasis, but this will be subordinate to the emphasis that is given to faith or spiritual vision, to repentance, or the genuine turning of the heart from things worldly to things spiritual, and to prayer as the out-breathing of the soul, by which the human heart comes into direct touch with God. Conversion to Christ rather than joining the church will be the aim of evangelistic effort, and a changed life and character will be regarded as the supreme evidence of conversion rather than regularity of creed, or the observance of ordinances. We shall never cease to teach and preach "first principles," for these are the very principles which unbelievers and new converts need to understand; but we shall learn to present them in a more irenic spirit than has often been done in the past. The spiritual meaning of the ordinances will be set forth along with the outward form, so that men will have a clearer understanding of the religious significance of these institutions and of their essential antecedents. No probationary period will be required of candidates for baptism, but conscientious pastors and evangelists will be more careful in training those who are to submit to baptism in order to be sure that they understand the meaning of the steps they are taking. No stereotyped method of having persons come forward to the front seat in order to make a stereotyped confession, and, after baptism, to come forward to receive the "right hand of fellowship" in order to admission to the local church, must be allowed to acquire the force of a divine requirement. These are mere customs or methods which may be changed, or abolished, if deemed expedient, only so that the essential thing be maintained, namely, that the believer shall confess with his mouth the Lord Jesus, whom he is to obey, and whose disciple he is to be, henceforth and forever. There is always danger that what is adopted first as an expedient may, by long usage, come to possess an authority and sacredness which belong only to divine command. This danger may make it necessary to modify some of our methods, before they become too much stereotyped to admit of variation without a rupture.

One of the greatest and most desirable changes which we believe will surely be accomplished during the new century will be in the order and spirit of the public worship. There is probably no other one respect in which there is greater need for improvement among the Disciples of Christ than the manner in which public worship is conducted. The absence in many congregations of the spirit of reverence and of worship in the house of God is painfully apparent. Members frequently gather in the vestibule, which is made a sort of social rendezvous, and exchange greetings in a loud voice, which seriously interferes with the meditations of those who are in the church. Sometimes this social chat is kept up after the persons are seated in the church, and even while the organ prelude is being played. It need not be pointed out how contrary all this is to the true spirit of worship, and to a proper respect for the house of God. The social feature of human life has its legitimate place, but it is not in the presence of the Lord's table or in the house of God at the hour of worship, when all hearts should be turned to God in devout meditation and prayer. There will be great improvement made, we hope and believe, both in the character of the music used and in the singing. There will be an improved order of exercises in which the idea of worship will have its proper emphasis and in which the congregation will more generally participate. The sermon, the Scripture lesson, the music, the prayers, the Lord's supper, the solemn silences, will all be made to conduce to the spiritual culture of the worshipers, and men and women will leave the house of God feeling that it has been to them the gate of heaven, through which they have had a vision of God and of divine things. This change is as sure to be brought about as that spiritual knowledge and spiritual life shall increase. A deeper religious life and a better conception of the nature of worship will be sure to find expression in a more orderly, reverent and helpful public worship.

Some other changes marking the probable course of future development will be noticed in subsequent articles.

A Forward Evangelistic Movement.

Some leading ministers in New York have issued a call for an American forward movement in evangelism, corresponding to the similar movement in England. In its call this committee recommends as follows:

(1) That a volunteer twentieth century Gospel campaign commission be organized at once to carry out the purposes of this movement in every city, town, and village in the United States.

(2) That such committee be organized by, and consist of, such Christian ministers and laymen as may be interested to promote this work.

(3) That such committee appoint a central, or executive, committee to direct the work.

(4) That in the larger cities district committees be appointed to carry on such work as may be planned in their respective districts, under direction of the central committee.

(5) That meetings for united prayer, preferably of a union character, be held, beginning on the evening of Sunday, December 30, and continuing each evening thereafter until the following Saturday evening inclusive (including a watch-night service on the evening of December 31, if desired).

(6) That the following week union noonday meetings be held each day, followed by "Week of Prayer" prayer-meetings, as recommended by the Evangelical Alliance, each evening.

(7) That the noonday prayer-meetings be continued the week following, and as long thereafter as the spiritual interest developed may seem to require.

We have no doubt but that some concerted action of this kind would serve the purpose of stirring up the evangelistic zeal of many churches and so result in good. We cannot agree to The Outlook's criticism upon such an organized movement, on the ground that "The kingdom cometh not by observation." If this passage means that Christians are to take no steps toward evangelization that might attract the attention of the people, then the church would indeed be handicapped in its conflict with the powers of darkness.

The kingdom of God does indeed come without observation, but the uniting of forces and means to make it come is hardly ever without observation. John the Baptist did not come without observation, nor did Jesus Christ and his apostles. They often created great excitement, and were accused of "turning the world upside down." The great revivals and reformations which have blessed the church and the world have not come without visible manifestations of their presence and power.

Let there be a co-operative effort in the cities especially, to reach the ungospeled masses, stir up the zeal of nominal Christians, and quicken the consciences of the people in order to civic righteousness and municipal regeneration. It should be wisely guided. Extreme emotionalism should be avoided, the gospel should be relied on as the instrument for accomplishing the necessary results, and all sectarian aims and party spirit should be held in abeyance.

We hope our churches and ministers everywhere will fall in with this forward movement, and co-operate heartily in preaching the gospel and in all methods not violative of New Testament principles. If we have some advantage in our evangelistic methods, let us illustrate them in fraternal co-operation with our religious neighbors, as far as we are permitted to do so. So shall we best show our zeal for Christian unity, and our unselfish aims.

Reports showing the progress of education in the Philippines have been forwarded by Gen. MacArthur. These show that there are over a hundred thousand children in the schools which have been put in operation during the year by army officers, and the general desire of both parents and children to learn the English language is particularly commented upon. In the establishment of the schools the people have given great encouragement and in many cases have taken the initiative. More than a hundred thousand dollars has been expended for school books and supplies, which have been distributed through the island. This kind of work, in connection with that of the Protestant churches in disseminating Biblical knowledge, is what will tell in fitting the Filipinos for the blessings and responsibilities of self-government.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Sometimes the "Easy Chair" runs across problems that puzzle it far more than those which vex the souls of theologians. Here is one which some of our Missouri readers may help us to solve: Recently we printed a brief but urgent editorial calling attention to the Missouri Bible College endowment fund, the entire amount of which, over $40,000, was imperiled by the lack of a few additional thousands, which should be subscribed before January 1. This enterprise is one which we would suppose would appeal powerfully to public-spirited Disciples in the state who feel an interest in the public standing of our cause. It is one the wisdom of which has commended itself to thoughtful minds throughout the whole country. Not one response reached us, nor any one else so far as we have heard, from that appeal. No brother or sister in the state had the matter sufficiently at heart to make a suggestion, a criticism, or to offer a word of encouragement or advice. This is what puzzles us. What are we to think of it? Has the brotherhood of Missouri lost all interest in the educational problem? If this be so, our condition is a very critical one and calls for the most earnest and prayerful consideration.

It may be said in explanation or extenuation of the above circumstance, that the brethren of Missouri are interested in some other educational scheme and not in the Bible College endowment. In what other scheme are they interested? What other institution in the state is receiving the moral and financial support of the brethren? None whatever. It may be said that the brethren of Missouri have another educational plan in their minds, namely, that of building up a college in some central part of the state, and endowing it so as to enable it to cope with the State University and other institutions. This scheme has been urged upon the brethren of Missouri for years without any adequate response. If there is anything that the brethren of Missouri are in favor of in an educational line, except the do-nothing policy, we should be glad to hear from them. If they are opposed to all educational enterprises in the state, let them speak out. It is time that the dumb devil was exorcised so that we can at least understand the situation.

Referring to the Bible College endowment again, it may possibly interest some one who has not manifested any interest in the matter to know that arrangements have been made with the donors to the endowment fund to continue their conditional subscriptions until May 1. If the $50,000 endowment is fully secured by that time, the pledges are still binding; otherwise they are void and the matter is at an end. It should be stated also that a few brethren, in response to personal appeals, have increased the total amount to about $45,000. The failure of an effort so reasonable, so imperious in its demand to supply Bible instruction to the students of the State University, including a large number from our own families and churches, would be the most serious back-set which has befallen our cause in Missouri in a half century. It would advertise us to the world as wanting in public spirit, in educational interest, in Christian liberality or Christian enterprise. It cannot be that the present stupor which seems to be upon the brethren of Missouri will continue very long. Let us hope, at least, that it may be shaken off, and that this vast host of disciples may rise to the demands of the hour and of the new century and face manfully the duties and problems which confront us. It is a time when men of wealth are pouring their thousands and their millions into educational institutions, as the best investment they can make for the future. Why is it that so few of our men of wealth in Missouri have caught this spirit of benevolence and are able to see and appreciate the opportunities which are before us, and the obligations which are upon us?

At any rate, shall we not have an expression of opinion from leading brethren of the state on this question? If they are opposed to the plan of offering Biblical instruction to the students of the State University then those who are leading in this enterprise are willing to abandon it. They do not wish to pursue a policy that is contrary to the sentiment of the brotherhood of the state. Anything would be better than this uncertainty and mysticism. Let us have a free and full discussion of our educational needs in the state. This is due not only to the Bible College but to the other institutions in the state. If this shall fail to call out any expression of sentiment on the subject, we will be justified in concluding that there is no sentiment on the subject of education among the Disciples of Christ in Missouri. We trust this conclusion will not be forced upon us.

Hour of Prayer.

The Heavenward Way.*

TEXT: "And an high way shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called the way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, yea fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor shall any ravenous beast go up thereon, they shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there: and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads: they shall obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Isaiah 35:8-10.

Human life is often conceived of as a pilgrimage. We are travelers passing through this world and having our destination in another. It is of the utmost importance that we travel in the right way in order to reach our true destination. Both the Old and the New Testaments have much to say concerning the road in which we are to travel. In the text above given, the prophet sees a time in the future when a great high way shall be thrown up over which the righteous shall pass. The following are some of the characteristics which this way possesses:

A High Way.

A high way is no ordinary road. It is one that has been especially prepared. Mountains have been leveled and valleys have been filled so that it becomes a well-marked, easily-found high way of travel. So much so that the prophet says of it that "the wayfaring men, yea fools, shall not err therein;" that is to say, it is a simple, plain, easily-found way. Any theory of religion that offers to men a very abstruse, hard-to-be-understood system of salvation, does not bear the mark of simplicity which Isaiah's high way possesses. Any sincere person seeking the way to heaven may readily find this high way. It has been prepared by prophets, and apostles, Jesus Christ Himself being the Chief Engineer.

*Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Jan. 16.

A Way of Holiness.

Concerning this high way, it is written that "the unclean shall not pass over it." It is the way of holiness. Those who would walk therein must put away all uncleanness, all "superfluity of naughtiness," as Paul would say, and be clean in heart and life. How delightful it is to walk in the companionship of those who are pure in heart, clean in life, and are seeking after things which are holy and right and true! The Psalmist asks: "Wherewithall shall a young man cleanse his way?" and answers, "By taking heed thereto according to thy word" (Psa. 119: 9). It is not an easy way, or a short way, which the young man needs, but a clean way.

A Safe Way.

"No lion shall be there, nor shall any ravenous beast go up thereon, they shall not be found there." The path of duty, the path of holiness, the high way thrown up by the king, is a safe way, and walking therein no man has any need to fear. It is while walking in such a way that one may sing with Whittier:

"I know not where his islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care."

It is impossible to overestimate the value of the consciousness that one's way of life is in harmony with God's will and that no permanent harm can come to him while living in this relation to God.

A Joyful Way.

"And the ransomed of Jehovah shall return, and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads; they shall obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." This is the way humanity has been seeking, in its blindness, through all its history, but it has been seeking it, for the most part, in the wrong way. It has been seeking joy and gladness through selfishness and through sensual gratification, instead of seeking it in the way of purity and of righteousness. Let it be known that the way of holiness, which is the Christian way, is the way of joy and gladness, and that the Christian whose life is not characterized by cheerfulness and gladness is misrepresenting the religion he professes. Real happiness alone can be found when the soul is in its rightful and normal relation to God, and any notion that it can be found in disobedience is a delusion of Satan.

An Old Way.

Away back in the days of Jeremiah, the prophet cried out: "Thus saith Jehovah, Stand ye in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls: but they said, We will not walk therein" (Jeremiah 6: 16). It was to make these old paths more manifest, and to lead men to walk therein, that Christ came into the world. He indicated the way when he said: "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. 11:28, 29). Jesus also replied to his disciples, when one of them said, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest and how can we know the way?" by saying, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no one cometh unto the Father but by me" (John 14: 6). It is, then, the Christian way, the way of Christ, in which we are to find simplicity, purity, safety, happiness, and by walking in which we are to reach at last our Father's house.

Prayer.

O Thou who art the Way, the Truth, and the Life, we thank Thee that Thou didst come into the world to seek and to save lost and sinful men, and that Thou hast pointed out the way of holiness and of salvation, by walking therein, so that we have only to follow Thy blessed footprints in order to realize true happiness here and to enjoy everlasting felicity in the world to come. Help us, we beseech Thee, to turn away from all our wanderings in the by-paths of sin, and follow Thee more faithfully and lovingly in the future, to the end that we may accomplish Thy will here on earth, and share with Thee, at last, the joys and honors of Thy triumphant kingdom. For Thy name's sake. Amen!

Questions and Answers.

If Christ came to the earth for the redemption of all mankind, why did he ignore China with its population of an hundred times more souls than Jerusalem?

A Subscriber.

It was needful that Christ should come to his own people, the Jews. The redemptive purpose of God runs through the Old Testament in the history of the chosen race, and finds its culmination in Christ, who, according to the flesh, was of the seed of David. It was evident that he could accomplish his mission for the whole world, including China, much better by coming as he did and where he did than he could have done by being born in China. It is not the fault of Christ but of the church that the Chinese and all other nations have not long since become acquainted with the salvation which Christ offers to men.

A brother was recently elected to an office in the church, who arose and said that he did not believe as the church believed; that he could not teach the observance of the communion every Sunday; that it took too much time; was too tedious, and too primitive, and that he did not put so much stress on baptism. What would you think of him for an officer in the church?

C. A. H.

It has the appearance, on the surface, of being a misfit. The brother may be well-meaning, but he needs to understand the nature of worship and the object of the communion service a great deal better before he is fitted to be an elder. As to his not putting so much stress on baptism, the trouble may be further back. He may not lay sufficient stress on the lordship of Jesus Christ and the supreme importance of obeying his commandments. Baptism and the Lord's supper are not likely to suffer in the hands of men who magnify the authority and the example of Christ, and who wish to do whatsoever He would like to have them do. They neither speak slightingly of baptismn or make a hobby of it.

Does the phrase "apt to teach," in qualifications of eldership (1 Tim. 3:2) necessarily mean public teaching? Can it apply to those who cannot speak in public? Have we not too many elders who cannot teach?

Philo Ingraham.

We do not think the qualification, "apt to teach" as used by Paul should be limited to public teaching, although this was probably its primary meaning. In other words, we believe Paul's practical sense would have led him to avail himself of the ability of a brother to teach privately in the office of elder, especially in the absence of those who were able to teach, both publicly and privately. A man may be very useful as an officer in the church for his clear judgment, his wholesome advice, his ability to understand and explain the Scriptures in private circles, or in house-to-house visitation, even though he may not be able to speak publicly. It is undoubtedly true, however, that we have too many men in the office of elder, who are not apt to teach either publicly or privately, because they have made no special preparation for teaching. We must train men to be teachers as well as preachers if we expect to have an efficient eldership.

Recently an Australian brother made the statement in our church paper that there is "an evident drift" among our American churches towards open membership, i. e., admission of persons not baptized to the full privilege of membership. In proof he made the following statement: "A short while ago, the largest of our churches in St. Louis divided on the question of membership—one section becoming an open membership church. More recently still, one of our largest churches in Cleveland, Ohio, declared itself in favor of open membership and is now practicing the same." The statement has also been made that a church in Brooklyn receives the unbaptized into membership. These statements have the tendency to prejudice the Australian brethren against the American churches, and nullify any effort towards better feeling between the two brotherhoods. Therefore, will you please state in the Christian-Evangelist whether the above facts are true, and also whether there is any tendency among the American churches to admit persons not baptized to membership. Yours fraternally, W. C. Moore, Evangelist.

Lygon Street Church, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

We can say of the report mentioned above, what Mark Twain said in reference to the report of his death—that it is "greatly exaggerated." To begin with, there was never any division in a church in St. Louis on the question of "open membership," as it is termed. It was a difference on fundamental questions involving the deity and lordship of Christ, and therefore the value of all that Christ ordained and taught. Our churches in St. Louis are a unit in their practice on this question. Whatever may have been the facts in the case at one time in the history of the Brooklyn church, with the history of which we are not fam liar, that church is as regular in its teaching and practice now as any other in the brotherhood. Even the matter in Cleveland was a solitary instance, as we understand, occurring several years ago, and not a permanent or characteristic practice. In other words there is no such "drift" as the Australian brother mentions. On the contrary we believe there was never greater unanimity among our churches as to the wisdom of adhering steadfastly to what they believe to be New Testament faith and practice than at the present time. But along with this, and not inconsistent with it, is the growing tendency to recognize the Christian character and worth of our brethren in other religious bodies, whose practices are not altogether in harmony with our own.

The Australian Commonwealth

Territory and Population.

With the birth of the new commonwealth of Australia into the family of nations it will be interesting to glance for a moment at some of the leading facts connected with her history and environment, to note some of the principal steps in the process of her development, and to form some idea of the part she is likely to play in the coming century. In the first place it is well to remember that the areas of the six federating colonies and of the United States (minus Alaska) are almost exactly the same, namely, 2,972,000 and 2,970,000 square miles respectively, so that from a merely territorial point of view Australia occupies a very prominent place among the nations of the world. Over her vast area—divided in two nearly equal zones by the Tropic of Capricorn, and fringed along its entire eastern and part of its western sides by mountain ranges—a most varied climate necessarily exists, but the two principal colonies, all the capitals and the bulk of the population are in the temperate region, free from trying extremes of heat and cold, blessed with plenty of sunshine and fresh sea air, and perfectly adapted to the development of the highest physical and intellectual faculties of the Anglo-Celtic race. The population, to be sure, is under 5,000,000, or less than that of Canada, but of that number fully 95 per cent. are of British or Irish descent, and therefore come of a lineage whose wonderful admixture of diverse elements has made it the finest for colonizing purposes the world has ever seen. No greater proof of what that splendidly endowed race is capable of achieving could be afforded than what it has already done in this far-away southern land.

Early History.

The Declaration of Independence by the United States of America had a marked influence on the future of the great island-continent the southern and attractive portion of which Captain Cook had discovered only a few years before. The English convicts, who had previously been sent to Virginia, were thenceforward sent to Botany Bay, and it was not till 1840—or just 52 years after Captain Arthur Phillip formally took possession of the whole continent, founded Sidney and proclaimed the colony of New South Wales—that the system of transportation was finally abandoned, and the convicts temporarily transferred to Moreton Bay. The first half of the present century was mainly occupied in exploring the physical features of the new continent, in discovering her vast agricultural and mineral resources, in establishing sheep farming as the principal industry, in forming a series of settlements in the most promising localities, and in laying, deep and broad, the foundations of a number of independent communities, each of which aspired to a constitution modeled on that of the parent land. A consulting council had already been granted to New South Wales in 1824 with power to make laws, but it was not till 1843 that the first representative legislative council, partially elected by the people, assembled in Sydney. By the middle of the century the population scarcely amounted to 70,000 souls, and, owing to the remoteness of the country from any other and the difficulty and consequent expense of access, there was little prospect of its being largely increased.

The First Constitutions.

But the second half of the century had no sooner dawned than several startling events occurred which so completely revolutionized the future of Australia that her political and social history may almost be said to date from 1851. In that memorable year the colony of Victoria was added to the five already formed, all were now allowed the privilege of partially electing their legislative councils, and these were instructed to frame constitutions suitable to their respective requirements, with the result that before the end of the decade the bicameral system of parliamentary government, similar in the main to that enjoyed by Great Britain, was, with the cordial assent of the imperial authorities, established, with one temporary exception, throughout the length and breadth of the commonwealth.

The Discovery of Gold.

But even the constitutional freedom, great and highly prized as was the boon, would not have made Australia what it now is had it not been for the fact that the very same year which was memorable for the granting of political power was even more memorable for the simultaneous discovery in New South Wales and Victoria of untold treasures of gold. This well-timed discovery did for Australia what a similar discovery at about the same time did for California. Adventurers poured in from all parts of the world, ordinary employments were temporarily deserted, in six years the population jumped from 70,000 to 400,000, the public revenue made an equally prodigious bound, and Australia entered on a career of restless activity which gradually spread to every sphere of employment, and, though modified and concentrated as the years have olled on, has never ceased to make its influence felt. The growing importance of the colonies was shown by the establishment in 1852 of a direct line of steamers between Great Britain and Australia, which replaced the old-fashioned sailing vessels, and in consequence for many years almost the whole of our commerce was transacted with the United Kingdom.

By the end of the decade the new conditions had wrought a wonderful change, the first census since the advent of responsible government was taken, and from the year 1861 accordingly the statistical history of Australasia begins. In that year the population of the commonwealth (excluding New Zealand and exclusive of aboriginals) already amounted to 1,153,973; the revenue and expenditures (exclusive of loan expenditure) to five and a half million sterling and five and three-fourths million sterling respectively, or about £15, 15s per head for each; the total trade had swollen to over forty-eight and a quarter million sterling or nearly £42 per head; while 10,000 vessels of nearly two and a half million tons visited our shores. In that same year we owned twenty-one million sheep and nearly four million cattle, and we exported seventy-five million pounds weight of wool, valued at over five million pounds sterling. We produced over ten million bushels of wheat from 700,000 acres and three million bushels of oats from 130,000 acres; nearly half a million gallons of wine, and last but not least nearly two and a half million ounces of gold. Finally the public debt of the commonwealth amounted to over eleven million sterling or £9, 8d per head.

The Expansion of Commerce.

Nearly forty years have elapsed since then, and the figures in every branch of industry have expanded to a marvelous extent. Wool and wheat still form our staple products, but other industries, such as that of frozen meat, have sprung up, and mountains of gold, copper, tin and iron ore have been discovered in various parts of the continent, some of which only await the advent of capital, and the larger fields which federation will give, to make Australia one of the richest countries in the world. The merest glance at the figures for 1899, with an advance proof of which I have just been supplied, will show what an astonishing progress has been made. In this first issue of federal statistics by Mr. Coghlan the figures for the commonwealth of New Zealand have been separated throughout, and it is the former only which I will quote. The population of the commonwealth has reached to 3,716,730, or just under four and a half millions, with New Zealand and the Australian aboriginals thrown in. The revenue and expenditure of the commonwealth now amount to over twenty-eight million sterling respectively, or a little more than £7, 10s per head for each; the total trade has swollen to over one hundred and forty and a half million sterling or £88 per head; while nearly 17,000 vessels, several of which exceed 12,000 tons, and totaling over twenty-one and a quarter million tons, visit our shores. We now own, notwithstanding our terrible losses from drought, seventy-four million sheep and nearly ten million cattle, and last year we exported over five hundred and fifteen million pounds weight of wool valued at nineteen million sterling. We produced forty million bushels of wheat from five and a half million acres, and eight million bushels of maize and oats respectively (of which latter, by the way, New Zealand produces twice as much as the six federal colonies combined), in addition to which we grow one and a quarter million tons of sugar cane and two and three-fourths million gallons of splendid wine. Our mineral wealth has also enormously increased. The commonwealth produced last year four million ounces or fourteen and a half millions pounds worth of gold, two and a half million pounds worth of silver, two million pounds worth of copper and over one and a half million pounds worth of coal. The total value of our mineral production from the start amounts to no less than five hundred million sterling, of which three hundred and seventy-two and a half million was for gold, thirty-nine million for coal, thirty-one million for silver and copper respectively, and eighteen and a half million for tin. Finally our public debt has swollen to the enormous amount of one hundred and ninety-five million sterling or £52 per head, most of which, it should be remembered, has not been incurred for wars or in preparation for war, as in other countries, but for the construction of revenue producing public works such as government railways, of which 13,000 miles are now open for traffic as against 233 in 1861. In addition to the heavy public debt there has been a total loan expenditure on public works to date of one hundred and twenty-four million sterling or another £50 per head, principally on railways and tramways, water supply and sewerage, telegraphs and telephones, and similar works.

America and Australia.

The able Chief Justice of New Zealand (Sir Robert Stout) recently drew attention to the importance of our import trade with the United States and Germany, which rose in 15 years from a little over one and a half million sterling to considerably over three and a quarter million sterling in the case of the United States, and from less than a quarter of a million sterling to over one and a half million sterling in the case of Germany, while during the same period the imports from the British Empire diminished from twenty-eight and three-fourths million sterling to twenty-seven and a half million sterling. The establishment of the splendid North German Lloyd line—whose ten and twenty thousand ton vessels are, with the White Star liners, among the sights of the port—has doubtless had something to do with this notable expansion of the German trade. This analysis of our external commerce is extremely significant, and shows plainly in what direction the trade of the future is tending. That the importance of the American trade is recognized in our midst is evident from the fact that one of the greatest demonstrations recently held in the city Town Hall was on the eve of the departure of the United States Consul (Colonel Bell) after a seven years' tenure of office, when representatives of all political and social parties, and a vast concourse besides, assembled to do honor to the "silver tongued orator" from the United States.

Colonial Rivalry.

Another extremely interesting analysis is that of the figures supplied by our internationa lrelations, commercial and otherwise, especially between Victoria and New South Wales, which shows that whereas the former started off in 1861, after ten years rush for gold, enormously ahead of the mother colony in population, amount of exports, number of factories, and in almost every other item of note, to-day the position is very nearly reversed. The result is largely attributable to the rival fiscal policies which for nearly forty years the two colonies have pursued. At the end of that period Victoria found her population diminishing, her miners trekking to Western Australia and her farmers to New South Wales, her markets filled with shoddy and her factories with girls, while sweating was established in her midst.

Commercial Motive for Federation.

To divert the catastrophe which seemed impending and to find some outlet for the goods which no one seemed willing to buy, some new policy was indispensable, and when federation was preached she hailed the new gospel with joy. To the Victorians it was a veritable deus ex machina, an unlooked-for happy solution of an apparently hopeless puzzle, which was to save them from ruin by placing the markets of Australia at their feet. This commercial aspect of the question was not, of course, the one which appealed most strongly to the founders or to the leading exponents of federation, nor indeed, was it one which touched most deeply the hearts of the people as a whole, but it certainly had an enormous influence on the trading and farming classes in some of the colonies, and in Victoria it played decidedly the dominant note. What federation has been achieved in spite of intercolonial antagonism bred of warring tariffs, in spite too of mutual distrust born of years of commercial strife, shows that the ties which bind us together are stronger than the forces which drive us apart.

The New Constitution.

The constitution evolved by the united labors of so many gifted minds is as democratic as could perhaps be expected from a community which, notwithstanding the labor element, is strangely conservative. The mere fact that the franchise for both Houses is manhood suffrage, and that very shortly it is sure to be extended to adults of either sex, makes it certain that the compelling force in Australian legislation will be democratic to a degree unknown in any previous age. More especially will this be the case in the Lower House, which will be elected on a proportional representation, but even the Upper House will necessarily feel the power of the democratic wave. Democrats would have been better pleased if the Upper House were elected on a proportional representation like the Lower, a difference of composition being secured by a difference in the age of the representatives as also in the size of the electorates, and if deadlocks between the two were settled by a referendum to the people en masse, but the colonies had been vested with self-governing powers too long to admit of so unselfishly democratic a principle as the former being obtained. There was a moment when it seemed as if the Upper House would be able to dominate the Lower as the Senate does in the United States, but this evil was happily averted by the opposition of the Right Hon. G. H. Reid and the subsequent action of New South Wales.

The Future of Australia.

The union of the colonies is bound to have a very startling effect on the commercial activities of Australia, the exact trend of which, however, may not be felt for some years. The abolition of intercolonial tariffs, which will take a year or two to bring about, will completely alter the internal condition of affairs. Her foreign commerce will doubtless expand, and the rival claimants for her favors will strain their utmost to win her regards. But while the importance of Australia as a commercial factor will undoubtedly increase, it is not in the domain of commerce that her influence will be mostly felt. She will be the democratic leader of the world. The great principle of freedom of commerce, the heirloom of the Empire from which she has sprung, will be applied externally as well as internally before the lapse of many years; labor experiments will be conducted on an unprecedented scale; trusts and combines, which are ruining the prosperity of the United States, will be unknown; and the great social problems, which are talked of elsewhere, will be solved on her shores. The new Commonwealth has indeed a part to play in the coming century which no other nation or country could play as well as she, and the importance of which it would be impossible to overestimate.

How to Study the Book of Acts.*

By W. J. Lhamon.

The book of Acts is a sequel to each of the four Gospels and to all of them. It should be studied as such, when one has traced the life of our Savior through to its climax in death, and his death to its climax in the resurrection, and his resurrection to its climax in the commission; and when one has seen his commission emphasized by his ascension, expectations are created and inevitable questions arise. One cannot think that these majestic causes shall be without effects. Shall the risen Savior's last and greatest words go unheeded, and around his empty tomb shall there gather no living body of believers? Upon such a supernatural foundation shall there arise no superstructure in our human history, and from such revelations shall there come no revolutions? One's soul recoils from the mere suggestion that the Savior lived and died and arose in vain. One looks for a sequel that shall be in keeping with such amazing antecedents and eagerly he turns over the first pages of the book of Acts. And there is the sequel indeed. There in the second chapter is the story of Pentecost and all the wonderful things of that great day. There is the preaching of the Apostle Peter, the presentation of Christ as Christ and Savior and Lord, the cry of the three thousand and their repentance and their baptism, in short the birth day of the Church of Christ. There follows the history of its growth and struggles; its expansion under persecution, its reaching out to Gentiles and its adjustment to Gentile influences, the conversion of Saul, the missionary journeys of the Apostle Paul, and the planting of the church in the Roman world. Standing as it does, the link between the cross of Christ on the one hand and all the later career of his Church on the other, the book of Acts is among the most interesting and impressive historic documents in all the realm of letters.

Our most general suggestions therefore to the student of the book of Acts are these:

1. It is a sequel to the story of the cross of Christ.

2. It is the history of the beginnings of the Church of Christ.

3. It is the historic antecedent of all the later career of the Church of Christ.

Following these most general suggestions many others may be offered.

1. The book may be studied from the standpoint of the two greatest leaders in the apostolic movement, namely, Peter and Paul. The record of the Apostle Peter's work closes with the fifteenth chapter and that of the Apostle Paul begins somewhat earlier and fills all the later chapters of the book. In the second and the tenth chapters of the book Peter rises to the supreme occasions of his ministry, while the ninth and the twenty-sixth record the supreme incidents in the life of Paul.

2. The book should be studied from the standpoint of the Jewish-Gentile conflict. The breaking down of the wall of separation between the Jew and Gentile was one of the most signal and beneficent victories of the new faith. The conflict with custom and prejudice was terrible and the signs of the battle are on many a page of the New Testament. Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit the Apostle Peter played a noble part in the struggle, having baptized Cornelius (chapter ten), and having given an entirely liberal and brotherly decision in the first council (chapter fifteen). But the Apostle Paul became the champion of a common faith and fraternity for both Jew and Gentile, and it is to him that we must look for the cosmopolitan forms and forces of the faith. Aside from this conflict the teachings, the sufferings, and the triumphs of the "Apostle of the Gentiles" cannot be understood. It was he who lifted the cause from a national to an international prominence and, aside from his own writings, the record of his achievements is in the last half of the book of Acts.

3. This leads one to say that the book may be studied from the standpoint of a missionary manual, recording as it does the movements of the Church outward from Jerusalem to Judæa, and to Samaria, and to Antioch. And thence, under the leadership of Paul, from Antioch to Asia Minor, and to Macedonia, and to Greece, and to Rome. All things considered, the missionary journeys of the Apostle Paul have never been equaled, much less surpassed. They furnish us with the norm of all missionary suffering and achievement. No ardent believer can study this book thoroughly without some thrills of joy in the fact that within the brief space of one man's active ministry the new faith proved itself such a conquering light over pagan darkness, such a quickener of conscience, such a rebuker of sins, such a breaker of idols, and such a pointed, piercing, two-edged sword to the minds and hearts not of Jews as Jews or of Greeks as Greeks, but of men as men. The international victories of the cross in the days of Paul are among the convincing proofs to us that the gospel is from God. By those victories we may reassure our faith and gird ourselves anew for international achievements to-day in our Lord's world-wide fields that are white unto the harvest.

4. The book may be studied from the standpoint of its record of conversions. Of all the books of the Bible this is distinctively the book of conversions. It is unique in this respect. There are no such detailed cases of conversion in any other book of the Bible. Here the way of salvation is many times taught in concrete forms, as upon the day of Pentecost (2nd chapter); in the conversion of the Ethiopian officer (8th chapter); the conversion of Cornelius (10th chapter); those of Lydia and her household and of the jailer and his household (16th chapter), and others. An attentive study of these conversions should have long since rebuked many a vagary and corrected many an error in the denominational world.

5. The preacher who would be ever earnest, practical and evangelical, may never cease to study this book from a homiletical standpoint. The sermons of Peter and Paul, though preserved for us in skeleton forms, are most remarkable in their fitness to times and places and peoples; in their inclusions of and emphasis upon simplest, strictest gospel truth; in their exclusions of a thousand extraneous fads and follies that mar the modern pulpit; and in their convincing and convicting power over the minds and wills of men.

6. In the last place, the book of Acts presents us with the first history of the Holy Spirit in the Church of Christ. Here the student should begin with the Savior's promises regarding the Holy Spirit given to his disciples on the evening of his last supper with them, as recorded in the 14th, 15th and 16th chapters of John. He should see these promises fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, in the conversion of the Ethiopian, in the home of Cornelius, in the first council, and in many other incidents and in the whole career of the Apostle Paul. It is precisely thus that our study of the Holy Spirit should begin.

Evolution at Bartlett's Landing.

By Burris A. Jenkins.

CHAPTER I. (CONTINUED.)

But to return to the barn-lot and November—the conversation of Henry Winfield and Elder Bartlett did not prosper as had been its wont. The young man's heart ached at the thought of any estrangement from him who had been more than a father to a fatherless boy. Yet he knew full well that the more liberal tinge which his thought had received from a closer study of the Campbells' words—both Thomas and Alexander, father and son,—the larger tolerance, the keener appreciation of the candor of others, would never accord with the Elder's iron cast of thinking. Hence through the morning the two worked side by side in silence.

At noon, "Sister Bartlett," as the Elder's wife was known in the little community of "Disciples," sat at the head of the table, and served piping hot coffee, strong as dripped lye, with molasses "sweet'nin' " and cream, in yellow "chiney" cups striped with blue, heavy as stone jugs; while Jane moved here and there about the table, directing two negro slave-boys, who bore huge platters of wild turkey, last season's sugar-cured ham, potatoes, squash and corn-bread, to say nothing of hard cider and six different kinds of preserves, as well as pumpkin and mince pies. Spite of all, indigestion was not rife in those stirring days.

Such occasions as this were seized by the wives to display their thrift and prevision. Indeed, Elder Bartlett's household was as thrifty as religious. The old man used to say with a keen twinkle, "Any fool can make money, but it takes a wise man to keep it." Naturally, therefore, Jane, his only heir, was much sought by dashing Missouri riders. Nay, she would have been sought for herself alone, for, as Henry Winfield once said below his breath—and some busy sparrow twittered it in her ears —"She's richer than her black-soiled corn-acres will ever be—richer in her good blood and beauty, in her good sense and fearless soul." But then, Henry was a bit fond of rhetoric, and allowance must be made for poetic youth. Nevertheless, Jane crimsoned like the hollyhock when the bird reported his words, and somehow believed him sincere. Well, perhaps he was.

Be that as it may, she seemed, at that joyous dinner, to pay him little enough heed. The dozen other gallants who had by no means, as Henry said, lost their chaff in his last night's threshing, came in for most of her attention. Her city education had, as all acknowledged, been far from rendering her "stuck up." She gave and took in the war of words. Fast and thick flew the merry jibes. In and out, through the warp and woof of whatever web fate was busy with that day, shot the bright, though homespun, threads of pioneer wit. Rapid riding and quick shooting had taught most of these young folk sharp thinking. There were some numbskulls, of course. But I am told there are a few such even in politer circles. For twenty miles around Bartlett's Landing, the basket-meeting and the spelling-bee, the dancing party and the school-house debate, corn-husking and hog-killing had cemented a close acquaintance and an easy freedom among the young men and women. In all Clay County none was more prized than Jane Bartlett. Even other women liked her, which is the sweet evidence of genuine honesty and modest simplicity.

Henry sat quiet through most of the meal and only occasionally ventured a mild jest. At his words Jane never took up the cudgels of her wit. She would as soon have thought of venturing upon a retort to George Washington. And yet communication did go on between them, which only woman's eyes were sharp enough to detect. The only other woman present was "Sister" Bartlett, and she betrayed no secrets. Whether she smiled inwardly or not, her daughter Jane knew, and she alone.

When the sun was well-nigh down, and the uneasy fowls, supperless because too disturbed to scratch for food, were wishing the barn-lot would clear, that they might go to roost in peace; when the last hog had been slain, scraped, halved and hung up in the barn; when Bartlett and Winfield were washing their elbows and tools in the same trough, Henry said:

"Elder, I've made up my mind to go to Bethany College."

"You have, son?" said the old man, falling into a form of speech he had not used for five years gone, while the glow of his eyes showed the fires within had kindled. "You have, son? When?"

"I'll start next boat day, sir."

"Well, she's due Friday, Henry, and the river's high. She'll probably be here on time. Short enough space to get ready, eh? But you're always slow to speak and quick to act. Whyn't you tell us so before?"

"I wasn't just sure, sir, and—well, I've got enough laid by for two years' schoolin' and Elder Campbell wrote that the other two would take care of themselves. As for mother—brother Tom'll look out for her, and I thought mebbe you'd—"

"Yes, indeed, boy. I'll be a neighbor to her. And Tom, he's goin' on fifteen now, ain't he? Old enough to run a farm the size of hers, with a bit of advice. Goin' to old Bethany! to Elder Campbell's own College! Ah, Henry, what a preacher you'll make! You'll walk in the old paths, too, under his guidance! The Father of the Reformation's sure to lead you right."

The level rays of the setting sun lit up the river yonder, and almost restored to gold the silver of the old man's hair and beard. Certainly youth had come back into his heart once more, in the bright prospects of his foster-son. What he himself had never been able to do; what, indeed, it had not occurred to him in his own young days to do; what he had cared nothing about till the noon of his manhood—this preaching of the gospel—he was now to see, at the sunset of his years, taken up by his intimate, his son. Happy is the Elijah that has an Elisha!

The sun dropped out of sight into the broad sweep of the river bend. A cold fog came crawling up the stream. The willows turned from gold to ash, and Henry's heart whitened over with misgivings. Preach, he would, yes; but preach, he feared, in a manner quite different from the Elder's hope of him. Preach, yes; but the wide-reaching words of Thomas Campbell, and the chapters of the one German book that had floated, in translation, against all currents of the Missouri, westward into his hands, had made a rift in the lute that he knew could never be patched up to sound in tune with the Elder's any more. There they stood, the old man talking joyously, the young man thinking hard. Down the wide limestone walk they passed to the picket gate, where they said good-night.

"Maw," said the Elder at supper, by candle-light, "Henry's going to Virginia for four years to school."

The wife heard a quick catching of the breath at her elbow, but it was a sound too suppressed for men's ears.

"Four years is a long time," she said quietly, and her motherly hand sought Jane's. "But he will make a worthy man."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

LI HUNG CHANG.

By F. E. MEIGS,
President of Christian College, Nankin, China.

About forty years ago there came to a close in China one of the many great rebellions which have taken place in the history of that country. Among the prominent generals of the imperial Chinese army at that time was Li Hung Chang. He was intimately associated with Gen. Charles Gordon (Chinese Gordon) during the campaign which resulted in the crushing of the rebellion. Because of the ability which he exhibited as a commander, and because the termination of the trouble was favorable to the imperial government, this man suddenly became great. He had honors showered upon him and positions of influence and power conferred while he was yet young. He was made prime minister of China while yet a comparatively young man. In China the prime minister usually has more real power than the emperor. He is the adviser of His Majesty, and his will is practically the law of the land. The emperor is an individual to be adored rather than obeyed, and the prime minister is supposed to stand between His Majesty and the common people, representing to him the conditions and needs of the people whose welfare His Majesty is supposed always to seek. It will be seen from this that the good or ill of the people is to no small degree in the hands of the prime minister.

The same was true in Japan before the adoption of constitutional government a few years ago. The power of one man to do great things for the good of his country is clearly seen in the work of Count Ito, Japan's greatest statesman. Less than forty years ago (at about the same time as the promotion of Li in China) Count Ito undertook the reconstruction, so to speak, of Japan. He is a patriot and a philanthropist. He gave himself to his country rather than to the enriching of himself and his family. How well he has succeeded, modern Japan in her rapid strides toward modern civilization, speaks in no uncertain terms. The Sunrise Kingdom must now be reckoned with, in these days, in all matters that affect the general welfare of the family of nations. To Count Ito, more than to any other internal influence, is due modern Japan. The question is frequently asked, Why is it that Japan has come to the front in such a way as to astonish the world, while China has remained in the embrace of the dark ages? I wish to answer this by saying that China has had no Count Ito.

I think that no one who will take the trouble to inform himself can doubt that at the close of the Tai Ping Rebellion just as great things were possible to China in the line of progress as to Japan at the time of the restoration. Nor do I think that such an one can doubt that anything at all possible to China could have been attained had Mr. Li been prompted by such patriotism and philanthropy as that of Count Ito. But, instead of doing as Japan's great statesman did, he evidently sought rather to enrich himself. No one doubts the ability of Mr. Li. He has been spoken of as the "Bismarck of the Orient." Gen. Grant spoke of him as "one of the three greatest statesmen of the age," classing him with Gladstone and Bismarck. He is yet spoken of by some as the "grand old man of China." At the time of his promotion to power Mr. Li, no doubt, was well informed as to the needs of China. He must have learned from his association with Gen. Gordon and the ever victorious army, that the antiquated tactics of the Chinese army must necessarily give way to modern drill. He must have been convinced that the ancient junks of the Chinese navy must give place to modern men-of-war manned with a well drilled and disciplined marine army. He must have seen that old-fashioned arms must be laid aside and modern weapons substituted therefor. He must have had impressed upon him the necessity of educational reform, of commercial expansion and of an open door. There is no doubt that he comprehended the great pretensions which he made to foreign representatives, and realized in some good degree the comprehensiveness of his promises.

Yet, what he has done or even attempted to do, has come so far short of the expectations of the civilized Powers as to cause serious doubt of the sincerity of the old man in the promises of his younger days. Since the death of Marquis Tseng Mr. Li has been practically the only man in China in command of any influence abroad and, as first adviser of the Dowager Empress, almost absolute ruler at home. That he has succeeded in enriching himself is evident from the fact that he is confessedly the wealthiest man in China, and is said to be one of the wealthiest men in the world. The question as to how he could acquire such great wealth will be answered satisfactorily, if you consider that really the only means of accumulating great wealth in China is by becoming an official. The man who succeeds in getting to be an official of any considerable rank is sure of at least a competency. What, then, would be the expectations of the head of all the officials? That Mr. Li has made the best of his advantages is plain from several facts.

He had the making of China's army and navy. Millions of money was appropriated for these purposes. At the breaking out of the Chinese war with Japan it was believed by the Chinese that they had an army and navy, but in the modern sense they had neither. Japan went anywhere she pleased with very little effective resistance on the part of China. Why? Because of inferior guns and poor ammunition. The supposably formidable fortifications proved but fragile affairs and the miserable tactics of the so-called army were an utter failure in the face of modern drill. Formidable ships of war, poorly manned, melted away before the less formidable vessels of the Japs, with modern equipment and maneuvers. What had become of the immense supplies of money which the officials had handled? It would be attributing a great deal of ignorance to Mr. Li to accuse him of not knowing the inferior character of the armament. Bismarck or Gladstone or Grant would have known. The most ignorant Chinaman knows the difference between a modern breech-loading rifle and an old-fashioned muzzle-loading iron-ramrod musket, with which the Chinese infantry was equiped in those days. It is said that these guns were bought of dealers for $2 apiece and reported at $9 apiece. That the real condition of the Chinese army was known to Mr. Li needs no argument in face of the numerous personal inspections he made, reports of which (now known to have been incorrect) appeared in the periodicals not only of China but of Europe and America. What became of the money appropriated for better equipment?

The fact that the emperor himself was not able to dispose of Li Hung Chang when the true state of affairs came to light, is another evidence of the firm hold he had upon the purse-strings of the country. From time immemorial it has been the custom of the Chinese government to decapitate generals who flee before the enemy or who prove recreant to their trust. All that was attempted in Mr. Li's case was the removal of his "yellow jacket." He lost very little of his real power or authority. When the time came for treating with the Japanese, Mr. Li was the only man whom the Chinese emperor could find to send on that mission. How Japan was cheated and China sold to Russia is familiar to all who know the sequel. That he now holds so prominent a position in the face of all the facts, of which the Chinese people and emperor are well aware, shows how nearly he owns China and the Chinese people. The Powers, even, suspect him now.

It will be seen that my opinion of the great statesman is that he has been a great hindrance when he might have made his country a nation among the nations of the earth. Of course, I recognize other causes of China's backwardness, but this one I believe to be the greatest of all. Nations as nations are not to be credited with an overweight of conscience in dealing with their neighbors. Their aggressions in China have been due in no small measure to China's want of push, and this want of spirit of push is due in no small degree to the spirit of greed on the part of her officials—of whom Mr. Li has been chief for forty years—which has oppressed the common people. Such a career would scarcely have been possible in any civilized country.

English Topics.

The Author of the "Bonnie Briar Bush."

An extraordinary thing has happened. It is a striking token of the drift of things and a real sign of the times. I suppose hundreds of thousands of Americans who read current literature are familiar with the "Bonnie Briar Bush," and with other works by "Ian Maclaren," as Dr. John Watson, of Liverpool, calls himself. This Presbyterian clergyman is minister at Sefton Park, Liverpool. He is famous both as a preacher and as a writer of Scotch religious stories. A book has this week appeared from his pen which shows his wonderful versatility, for it is purely theological. It is entitled "The Doctrines of Grace," and it is likely to attract much attention. Dr. Watson belongs to the denomination which is still the stronghold of Calvinism, but he himself is very uncomfortable as a Calvinist, for he is a man of very broad, liberal, and enlightened mind. His book is nothing less than an attempt to reconstruct Calvinism and to adapt it to the requirements of modern progressive thought. With this scheme I am not concerned in alluding to his new treatise, for I do not feel that it is reasonable or hopeful. Dr. Watson cannot be a Calvinist and at the same time an anti-Calvinist. Spurgeon all through his beautiful ministry tried to sustain that experiment. Even his magical genius failed to reconcile the narrow and choking theology of the Geneva mediævalists with the grand breadth of the loving Divine Fatherhood proclaimed by Christ. But in Dr. Watson's book there is just one sentence which is worth whole chapters of discussion upon his curious revision of Calvinism. It is just this. "Ian Maclaren" says on page 270: "The division of the Church into sects is a distinct and flagrant sin." Now, I mean to say that when one of the most famous denominationalists of the age writes such words as these, we are free to interpret them as seriously symptomatic of the changes that must come over the religious complexion of society. Here in England, our faithful "Christian Commonwealth," which holds up unfalteringly the pure white flag of the ancient hallowed gospel, has been for years reviled by Dr. Watson's own Presbyterian friends for saying much milder things than this new dictum of his. I am wondering what his co-denominationalists are going to say to him. He has said a very awkward thing for any sectarian to utter.

The Great Defect of the English Baptists.

A considerable sensation has this week been produced in religious and literary circles by a long and elaborate article in the "Daily News," the best of all the London morning papers. The subject was "The Future of the Baptist Denomination; Its Outlook for the Twentieth Century." I and many others have read this keen and incisive article with much interest. I came out of the Baptist body and have numerous dear friends in it. The English Baptists are in great affinity with us on most points. Their main divergence is, however, on the most essential matter of all; that is to say, they are wrong on what we consider the vital matter of Christian unity. Now, is it not singular and significant that a secular and political organ like the London "Daily News," a paper which is altogether impartial in its religious purview, should point out in a special article that "The great need of the Baptist Denomination is an increase of unity?" There now! That is actually the opening sentence of this elaborate and interesting article. And is not this a scathing rebuke in what it implies? I think so, because I have always been shocked and distressed at the scornful manner in which Baptists generally treat our plea for Christian Unity. And now, behold, here is a popular worldly newspaper proclaiming to the whole nation that the grand and fatal defect of Baptists is their lack of unity among themselves! What a painful lesson, if Baptists would only learn it! The facts and statistics adduced are very powerfully evidential of the truths of the indictment. For instance, Spurgeon's Metropolitan Tabernacle, which enjoys the largest membership of any individual church in the world, still remains outside the Baptist Union, and many other so-called tabernacles continue to follow the Spurgeonic lead, under Thomas and Charles Spurgeon, sons of the great deceased C. H. Spurgeon. The effects of the downgrade controversy are still unhappily apparent. Moreover, it is surprising to find that out of 239 Baptist churches in London, only 155 have joined the London Baptist Association. Some sixty of these call themselves Strict Baptists. The Baptist Union is working hard to induce the denomination to raise a solid Central Twentieth Century Fund of 250,000 guineas for certain specified purposes. But the writer in the "Daily News" observes: "I suspect it would prove a far harder task for the Secretary of the Union to persuade all the Baptist Churches in the country to combine loyally in one great Union." Ah, yes! I should think that it indeed would!

The Prophet of Optimism.

Now I will for a moment give an echo of what has just been uttered by one of our most popular living authors. I have been at the beginning of this letter referring to one great English writer and his theology. The name of that popular writer of religious stories, Hall Caine, must be equally familiar to my American friends. He is not only renowned as the author of "The Christian," etc., but he is a favorite public lecturer. In a talk in Lancashire he has been discoursing on "The 19th Century as the People's Century," and on "The 20th Century as the Century of Humanity." Mr. Hall Caine strikes an inspiring note whenever he speaks. He says that the 20th century will have for its mission the moral welfare of the whole human family. Consumption will be entirely wiped out, as small-pox has practically been eliminated during the second half of the 19th. Even cancer and cholera may, as epidemics, become evils of the past, and death itself will, he thinks, be more natural and less accidental, whether of young or old. Above all, he thinks the political state of man will improve by the still further recognition of the falseness of all forms of arrogated authority, and by the recognition of man's right to rule himself. War, he thinks, will cease, because the "Century of Humanity" will not hesitate to say that humanity is one, with the same interests, the same aims, the same passions, the same impulses, with love and pity and fatherhood and brotherhood the same in all races—that a good man is a good man and a bad man a bad man, whatever his name or nationality or creed or color, and that the world must sooner or later come to recognize the sublime truth of that foremost and grandest of the principles of Christ, which teaches the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man. For such encouraging teaching as this Mr. Hall Caine deserves our gratitude. I, for one, heartily concur in his deductions from the progress hitherto made under the auspices of Christian civilization.

"Christian Commonwealth," Number One Thousand.

It is with pardonable pride that we who have for years taken an enthusiastic interest in the organ of our work in England record the issue of the thousandth number. With varying fortunes this noble and, as far as Britain is concerned, unique religious weekly has pursued its way. Large numbers of journals and magazines have appeared and vanished since the "C. C." began its existence. It has lived on through calm and stormy weather, and we trust that its very best days are ahead of it. It seeks to do in this country just what the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST attempts in the United States. Its mission is no failure. It has sapped many citadels of fallacy. It indoctrinates minds in places where we have not yet the means to plant churches. Happy evidences are often forthcoming of its influence even within the various denominational circles. It is a literary pioneer of the grand movement which the churches of Christ are promoting. It is a fact which must not be overlooked that thousands of Christians are now still entangled in sects who are no longer sectarian in spirit, though they are in form. This improvement is largely owing to the secret, permeating influence of the "C. C." Of the three men who have founded this organ not one is with us now. W. T. Moore is living in Columbia. He takes the same interest as ever in the paper, but cannot of course personally preside over its destinies. Henry Varley lives in Australia. J. W. Kirton is dead. But through all changes the "C. C." lives on and fights for the good old Jerusalem doctrine.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

London, England, Dec. 10, 1900.

A Wayside Study.

C. B. Carlisle.

When I mailed my last letter to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, I dropped it in one of Uncle Sam's pouches, hanging in a chapel tent, furnished by Helen Gould for my workshop as a sky scout, in the army, away round on the other side of the world, at Dagupau, 120 miles by rail north of Manila, Philippine Islands. This one, I put into a post office that is right in under the mighty shoulder of Cloud Peak, the highest point in the Big Horn mountain range, Wyoming. I am forty miles from the sound of a locomotive whistle; working away at the rehabilitation of a church that suffered collapse from an overdose of sensationalism, but even in this wayside study, I hear the awfully frightened cry of those who have their whole religious life and trust wrapped up in the napkin of a particular brand of orthodoxy; and, in their thinking, the only good and the only true one, and for whose safety, in the turmoil of the transformation of religious thought, they are supremely agonized. And I confess that I really enjoy the perturbation of these religionists.

I am heartily glad that the beginning of the new century is distinguished by the decay of these inflexible orthodoxies. At the best they are but the aggregations of ideas, usages and beliefs, which a certain religion assumes. I am heartily glad that men in and out of the church have come to see that what we really want in religion, what the average and the unaveraged people want, is to be found, not in these orthodoxies, just as raw orthodoxies, but in the newer theories and methods that have come to us recently.

It has been discovered that many of the doctrines that have been built into our theology were not taken out of the divine quarry at all. This theology has covered over some of the grandest promises in the Bible. We are tearing away these coverings; and of course there is a fright, and cry and protest, from these orthodoxy-ists. So there was a cry from Archbishop Tait when reformers urged a revision of the Prayer Book. He said: "You had better let it alone; if you dig out one stone of the wall, the whole building may collapse." These "are old, familiar things; better let them alone." His thought is illustrated by the preacher who was making a sermon out of the story of the Prodigal Son. When he came to the butchering of the calf he thought to intensify the interest of his audience; so he exclaimed: "Not a calf, but the calf; the old, familiar calf; the calf that had been in the family for years and YEARS, and YEARS." These religionists want to hang on to the old things because they are old and familiar. Well, let them. There is no law against it. Let them understand, however, that men will accept no creed to be a tyranny over them. That day has passed. Men must have, will have, room in the creed for every truth that may come. You can't get men to build their new faith into any exact pattern of the old. It is out of the question. The form of the new religion will be determined by the mental habits and modes of expression, the vogue to-day. Truth never changes, but the way of expressing truth and of lodging it into human heart-soil constantly varies. The language of to-day differs from the language of yesterday, and the language of to-morrow will differ from that of to-day. It is for us in the language of to-day to express the truth as we see it to-day. The other ceases to be true. The world isn't loitering; there is change everywhere. Our farmers can't farm as their fathers did. To-day, the farmer is simply a superintendent, directing the giant, tireless labor of electricity and heat and steam.

Out on the modern farm the latest thing in agricultural mechanics, and not Maud Muller—barefoot Maud—"rakes the meadow sweet with hay." The bicyclist and the automobile bowl along the road at a 20-mile pace, where once the "Judge rode slowly down the lane;" slowly, in order to keep Maud in sight as long as possible. That Maud went through a narrow, pinched-off front yard, grudgingly cut out of the acres, with the dog-fennel rasping between her toes. The modern Maud, graceful in her summer gown and tooth-pick shoes, goes over a great wide lawn, with a court of croquet, where with ball and hammer she plays the game of hearts with her Cholly Dewdimple.

So the changes have come in these religious things, and they are as gratefully met as are the changes in our temporal belongings. Our ministry will never again be a narrow, coffined and cribbed thing, for the Christ and his cross is our message to men. It is our ministry to lead men to find spiritual rest and sanctuary in the presence of Christ. We need never be afraid that our ministry may be a narrow and one-sided or monotonous one, because we make Christ and his story and his cross the rule of our work. We can touch and help every subject from the cross.

Buffalo, Wyoming.

From Caesarea Philippi To Nazareth.

Charles Reign Scoville.

At 7:30 A. M., Oct 12, we left Cæsarea Philippi and its beautiful and aged olive orchards—probably planted by the Romans—passing out near the south gate, which, with a portion of the wall and the stone bridge with a large archway leading to it, is all that is left of the magnificent ancient defenses. We also passed large pieces of fine granite columns lying by the wayside.

Our route to Dan led us three miles straight westward over what Dean Stanley called "an unshaded carpet of turf," "through trees and every variety of foliage, through a park-like verdure which casts a strangely beautiful interest over this portion of Palestine."

The ruins of Dan are on a mound which rises about 40 feet above the plain and is 330 yards long and 270 yards wide. This is now called Tell-el Kadi, meaning Hill of the Judge, or Dan. (Dan in Hebrew, Kadi in Arabic and Judge in English are synonymous.) As I rode my horse over these crumbled ruins, I thought continually of the prophecy, "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backwards." On the west side of this mound over a Muslim tomb stands a sacred oak. The Mohammedans believe that if they tear a rag from any garment worn by the sick and tie it to the branches of this tree, the disease will leave, consequently all the lower branches are well decorated. Just northwest of this tree bursts forth a great spring which is one of the largest and most beautiful in all the world. Josephus called it the "Little Jordan" and it really starts out as a full-grown river and in fact is the main source of the Jordan. The soil here is exceedingly fertile and the dense, rank growth extends along the river all the way to Lake Merom, or Huleh.

Dan was the northern frontier-town of the Israelitish kingdom, hence at this point our tour of the Holy Land—"from Dan to Beersheba"—properly began. We proceeded due west across the head of the Jordan valley, passing a herd of young camels, many Arab tents and large threshing floors covered with golden grain. Thence we journeyed southward along the base of the mountains of Naphtali and in about one hour came to Shiekle Yusuf and a large spring which is the last of the three sources of the Jordan. Several flocks of goats were watering here and a herd of Asiatic buffaloes were lying in the spring with merely their horns, eyes, ears and noses out of the water. I really wished our faithful horses might be as well secluded from the tenacious and persistent Syrian flies.

We stopped for lunch in the luxuriant shade of a low, broad terebinth tree. Near by in an olive orchard the Arabs were conducting a funeral which we attended. There were about 250 Bedouins present and as the corpse was lowered into the grave, some prayed, some sang (howled), some beat large drums and some mothers searched the heads of their infants for the ever-present travelers—the third plague of Egypt.

Continuing our journey we passed the waters of Merom where Joshua completely routed the confederacy of northern chiefs under Jabin, and at 5 o'clock we came in sight of the Sea of Galilee. Thirty minutes later we drew rein at Ja'uneh, a Jewish colony of a hundred families established by Baron Edmund Rothschild of Paris. The land and the houses, which are built of white limestone, were given to these peasants on condition that they properly use them. There is a synagogue and school here and they also have street lights and waterworks and free baths. Mr. Rothschild supports a doctor and a night watch and keeps up a dispensary. Wheat is worth 80 cents this year and the government tax is one-eighth. The farmer places the grain in eight piles and the tax-collector takes his choice. Mr. Rothschild and others have expended nearly $16,000,000 in 16 years and have established 18 such colonies.

We left Ja'uneh very early in the morning and were soon back on the direct caravan route from Damascus to Jerusalem. We passed a well-preserved and very extensive ruin of an ancient khou—a stone building about 100 feet square. Paul while on his tour of persecution undoubtedly passed here, and probably spent the night at this very place. Crossing a tongue of land about three miles wide and nearly four long, which might have once been covered with cities, we came to the ruins of Keraz'eh, the Chorazin of the Gospels. Naught remains but confused heaps of stones beneath which have been traced the walls of square houses and one synagogue. These walls are 2 feet thick and are of basalt blocks, the largest house measuring 27 feet square. This eminence commands a fine view of the Sea of Galilee, mountains of Galilee, Mount of Beatitudes and Mt. Tabor in the distance, and the cities Capernaum, Bethsaida (?) Magdala and Tiberias—a scene too sublime for minute description, the center and heart of all, the Sea of Galilee, beautiful in radiance, magnificent in outline, stupendous in interest and sacred in memories, was at once stamped upon my heart, an image of beauty to remain there changeless and indelible until its pulses cease to beat forever.

There are several claimants for the location of Capernaum but the evidence is in favor of Tell'Hum. The ruins which extend half a mile along the lake are about a quarter of a mile wide and are backed by a gently rising plain. The village consists of only a few miserable huts and some of the ruins are surrounded by a stone wall. These belong to the Franciscans who, in order to preserve them, have covered them up, only abiding an opportunity to thoroughly excavate, when no doubt many most interesting discoveries will be made. The remains of a white limestone building 75 by 54 feet have been traced, very probably those of the synagogue built by the centurion whose sore our Savior healed. When Jesus was driven from Nazareth he made Capernaum his home. Here was his residence during three of the most interesting years of his life. This was the scene of many miracles and "gracious words."

At Magdala we hired a fishing boat manned by three Arabs to take us around to Tiberias. The boat had one tall sail, but as there was but little wind, they were compelled to row all the way. There were ten of us in all and when one of our party finally lay asleep in the bottom of the boat the place seemed hallowed by the memory of the apostles in a like boat with Him whom they aroused from slumber to speak the awakened storm to sleep. Still do those beautiful shores seem to re-echo with "Peace be still." And the first effect and the enduring one of our glorious surroundings was Peace. The modern Tiberias is entirely surrounded by a high wall furnished with many large round towers. At the gate of the eastern wall, which extends along in the water, we reluctantly disembarked after having sung, "Sweet Galilee, where Jesus loved so much to be." The town has 4,000 inhabitants, of whom two-thirds are Jews, 1,200 are Muslims and 200 are Christians—Greek, Latins and Protestants. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Tiberias became the chief seat of the Jewish nation and of Hebrew learning. It has at present ten synagogues and the study of the Talmud still flourishes. Ancient Tiberias included the site of the modern town and extended southward along the lake where may be seen the ruins of a thick wall, fragments of buildings, columns, and of an aqueduct. Just south of these are the famous hot springs over which are built several baths. The principal spring has a temperature of 143 degrees Fahrenheit, and the waters are said to have medicinal properties.

Our next point of interest was Kefs Kenna (village of Kenna)—the Cana of the Bible. It has 600 inhabitants, about equally divided between Greeks, Christians and Muslims, with however a few Latins and Protestants. A Latin chapel is said to occupy the spot where water was made wine and in a Greek chapel are shown two earthenware water pots which are said to have been used on the occasion of the first miracle. But they are less than one-third the size of those described in the Bible so must have been shrinking some through the intervening centuries. A tradition points out the house of Nathanael, the Israelite in whom there was no guile. And it was while at Cana that Jesus healed the nobleman's son who lay sick at Capernaum.

As we had been riding for two hours in a dashing rain—the first we had encountered—and were very wet we hastened on towards Nazareth which is three miles south. Just below Cana at the spring, where all the people of the town come for water, were many girls whose pictures we were taking with the water jars upon their heads, when the most beautiful woman we had seen in Palestine came riding along on a donkey. I said to one of our party that I regretted very much that I could not have a "chat" with her as we journeyed the same way, when much to my surprise she gave me a bright answer in good English, and the "chat" began. I found that she was a Christian and lived at Nazareth, and had learned to speak English in the American school there. I had read much of the beautiful women of Nazareth and since having seen them I must say in their behalf that they are free from the horrid tattooing prevalent elsewhere, and they certainly are the best appearing ladies in the land. There is a good carriage road from Tiberias to Nazareth via Cana and Meshhed, the Gath Hepher of the Bible which was in the territory of Zebulon and was the birthplace of Jonah whose tomb is still shown.

As we came to the top of the great hill upon the side of which Nazareth is built, a most beautiful scene opened up before us. First, far to the westward could be seen the great Mediterranean, then just before us the most beautiful city we had seen in Palestine—Nazareth, the home of Jesus and the scene of the annunciation. From this very spot Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem to be taxed and to this place they returned from Egypt. Here our Savior spent his childhood days and here began his public ministry. Here the second attempt was made to take his life, after which he dwelt in Capernaum and we have no record of his ever again visiting the scenes of his childhood.

Over the low mountains to the east we could see the beautiful green and cultivated Mt. Tabor. South of this little Hermon with the cities of Endur, Nain and Jezreel, to the south a part of the plain of Jezreel. To the southwest Mt. Carmel projecting into the sea, and just north of it the bay of Acre. North of us was the plain El-Bottof and the ruins of Saffurigele, beyond this was Safed, which we passed two days before, and still in the far distance arose Mt. Hermon, at whose base we had dined five days previous. But best of all immediately before us was Nazareth. Its dazzling white walls in the green framework of cactus hedges, fig trees and olive orchards, presented a most pleasing appearance and I was delighted that I was to spend a Lord's day and my birthday in a city which derives its celebrity from its connection with the life of our blessed Savior, and which in that respect has a hold on the minds and hearts of men which it shares only with Bethlehem and Jerusalem.

New Century Christian Banquet.

J. E. Lynn.

The Christian Church at Springfield, Ill., was the scene on New Year's evening of a most unique and significant event, the New Century Christian Banquet. "The occasion," in the words of the toastmaster of the evening, Judge Charles P. Kane, Vice-President of the American Christian Missionary Society, "was to mark the dawning of the new century, by the coming together of representatives of all Christians of the city, forgetting all their prejudices and remembering that they are bound together by ties that can never perish and to do what can be done to hasten the day when the walls that divide the Christian forces may be forever torn down, never again to be rebuilt." The Christian Church was the host and had invited the pastors, elders, deacons, vestrymen and stewards and their wives, of the twenty Protestant churches of the city to sit down together. There were three hundred and fifty invitations issued and most of that number were present. After a bountiful supper had been served the intellectual and spiritual feast, which constituted the grandeur of the occasion, began and lasted for two hours and a half. Nine toasts were responded to by ministers and prominent laymen representing all the denominations present. The program was divided into three parts: first, Fraternal; second, Prophetic; third, Martial. The subjects were: True Fraternity; Nineteenth Century Tendencies toward Christian Fraternity and Coalition; Church Comity; The Call of the New Century to the Church; The New Testament Ideal—A United Church; When the World Shall Be Full of the Knowledge of God; "In the Enemies' Country;" Christian Tactics, Column Right, March, Touch Elbows; Victory.

"The church must ultimately be one whether we will or not" was the emphatic and repeated declaration of Dr. F. W. Taylor of the Episcopal Church, and the sentiment received the hearty applause of his hearers. "There is," said he, "no service from the old prayer book which is said in our church in which we do not pray for unity. That it shall be, that it must be, we firmly believe." "I join with you," said Dr. D. F. Howe, of the First M. E. Church, turning to the pastor of the Christian Church, the writer, who had just spoken plainly on the "New Testament Ideal—A United Church," "in the fervent desire and prayer that the ideal of which you have just spoken may be realized on earth before this century closes and if it costs the giving up of some points of Methodism I am willing they be given up." Robert H. Patton, Baptist, said, "In making a plea for union I want to suggest that while we have been quarreling among ourselves and have been divided the united enemy has been stealing the brightest gems from the households about us. I want to plead for a union so firmly welded that the world can see that we are one." The public press in commenting upon the meeting suggested that "if the spirit of the addresses delivered and the applause with which they were greeted meant anything, then the Christian forces of our city have resolved to march shoulder to shoulder into this century to do battle against the wrong."

A resolution was passed as follows:—"Resolved, that the thanks of the churches represented in this gathering are hereby tendered the Christian Church for the beautiful thought of calling us together, for the lesson of fraternity so forcibly taught and for this opportunity of having our hearts stirred towards Christian unity."

Current Literature.

In Jesus Christ and the Social Question, Professor Francis G. Peabody, of Harvard, gives a suggestive and informing study of the teaching of Jesus as bearing upon the present day questions of social reform. The serious attention which this question has come to receive in our day is in itself a hopeful sign—more hopeful perhaps than any particular utterance which has been made upon the subject. The problem is, as Prof. Peabody says, "not so much a problem of social amelioration as a problem of social transformation and reconstruction," and it is not worth while for any one to dabble with the social question at all who is not willing to go to the farthest lengths in removing the causes from which social ills arise. The necessity for such thoroughness is frankly recognized in this book, yet its author possesses nothing of the temper of a revolutionist. Too much a scientist to become excited or declamatory even over such a subject as this, he maintains throughout his discussion a calmness and sanity which have been lacking in the works of some writers. His declaration that the teaching of Jesus did not consist primarily in the enunciation of social principles, but that these are mere inferences from his revelations in regard to the character of God and the duty of men as individuals, marks him at once as not an extremist. No one, however, can read the book and accuse the author of making too little of the social teaching of Jesus. A single quotation from the chapter on "The Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Rich" will show the tone of the book: "The Christian rich man knows well that it is hard for him to enter the kingdom of God. He holds before himself, therefore, the solemn alternatives of Jesus—the mastery of wealth or the abandonment of it. Thus the wealth of the Christian rich man becomes to him a trust for the use of which he is to be scrupulously judged." Truly the Christian conception of property is to be found in the idea of stewardship rather than in a mediæval exaltation of poverty as a virtue or in the modern socialistic theories (The Macmillan Co. $1.50.)

Six addresses delivered by Henry M. Booth, first president of Auburn Theological Seminary, to the successive graduating classes of that institution, are collected under the title, The Man and His Message. Together they present a high conception of the Christian ministry. The keynote of the book is the appeal for the preaching of Christ and him crucified. (Revell. $.75.) F. B. Meyer's little volume, The Prophet of Hope, is a series of studies in the prophet Zechariah. Setting aside all critical questions, he gives what might be considered a long expository sermon on the book. (Revell. $1.) Edward Cridge's As it Was in the Beginning is called by its author an application of the historic principle to the Mosaic Scriptures, and its object is to prove from the earliest records in the Bible that by Jesus all things were made and that through him God has always ruled the world. It consists for the most part of a rehearsal of pre-Mosaic events and is not conspicuous for either scholarship, accuracy, or critical method. (Revell. $1.25.) Thoughts for the Quiet Hour is a collection of brief, suggestive paragraphs collected by D. L. Moody and arranged in the form of a year book. (Revell. $.30.)

January Magazines.

Readers of the article on the Empress Dowager in the Atlantic Monthly may finish with varying opinions of the woman who rules China (so far as the Powers will let her) but they will be of one mind as to the remarkable strength of a personality which has made head to such an extent against Chinese custom that her sex has been no bar to her practical sovereignty. The first of the Reconstruction papers appears in this number. It is by Professor Woodrow Wilson and is a strong piece of historical writing.

The Ledger Monthly contains all sorts of things, from a continued story by Hall Caine to dissertations on Mexican drawn-work and fancy cats. It is a much better paper than it used to be.

The People, the Land and the Book is the somewhat elaborate title of a new illustrated Hebrew-Christian quarterly, devoted to the people of Israel, the land of Palestine and the Jewish traditions and literature.

The Missionary Review of the World is naturally devoted largely to the missionary situation in China and the outlook for the new century. There is an interesting article on the Kentucky mountaineers by the president of Berea College.

The Treasury of Religious Thought contains an article on religious movements during the nineteenth century, describing the multiplication of denominations and the organized missionary, temperance and philanthropic efforts which have been made during the century.

The Woman's Home Companion stands as the sister magazine (and an older sister) to the Ladies' Home Journal, with the same general make-up and the same character of contents. Lilian Bell writes entertainingly (even to the masculine mind, which is not usual for her) of shopping in the great cities of Europe.

Peixotto, the artist, has taken a cycling trip in Touraine, an account of which, with excellent illustrations, which are the only kind he draws, is published in the Cosmopolitan. It it a pity that, with all its real merits, the Cosmopolitan does not have done with such grotesque extra-mundane vagaries as The First Man in the Moon.

Scribner's for the present month shows a strong bent toward articles of travel and description. The admirably illustrated article on Modern Athens (the first of a series) and the third in Henry Norman's series on Russia fall clearly within this class and Henry James' "Winchelsea Rye and Dennis Duvall" has a strong turn that way, though its motive is different.

Ainslee's magazine is largely devoted to fiction, but the best thing in it is the following quatrain by Arthur Stringer:

THE MILLIONAIRE.

Wasted and all in rags his starved soul went,
And opulently paupered, he grew old,
And stood with loaded hands and heart forespent,
A beggar with a million bits of gold.

Doubleday, Page & Co.'s new magazine, The World's Work, is trying hard to put itself in the list of great magazines. It has scarcely gotten there yet, but the three numbers already published have shown such rapid improvement that it may be virtually considered as a magazine of the first class. If it is not quite that now, it will be in a month or two. In general internal appearance and make-up it resembles the Review of Reviews.

The leading feature of the Century is S. Weir Mitchell's "Comedy of Conscience," wherein the author wrestles with this subtle point of casuistry: If a thief picked your pocket and left a diamond ring what would you do with the ring? Sir Walter Besant's "Shadow and Sunlight in East London" deals largely with the recreations of the poor. Charles Battell Loomis' series on "Some Americans Abroad" begins with a brief description of the exploits of the men whose constant motto and refrain is "There is only one Noo York."

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly still, as always, is a magazine of fiction for the most part. It has articles this month on Cuba's constitutional convention and the business of making and selling locomotives.

The Ladies' Home Journal maintains its large and somewhat unwieldy size in spite of the general tendency toward "the magazine form," presumably for the sake of its large pictures. It is worth while so long as they are able to publish such full-page pictures as W. L. Taylor's series on The Last Hundred Years in New England and Frost's Country Folks. The editor, Edward Bok, writes a page of new century reflections, telling how he did it and how he expects to do it in the future.

It is always a distinguished and varied company of contributors who jostle each other in the pages of the North American Review. In the present number the most notable article is Ex-President Benjamin Harrison's study of the constitutional status of annexed territory. It is a plea for an adherence to the old American doctrine that man is endowed by his Creator with certain inalienable rights which the constitution merely recognizes and does not create, and maintains that we ought to extend those rights to all peoples over whom we have control. Ex-Secretary Alger's arraignment of Gen. Miles and defense of Gen. Eagan, in his article on the "embalmed beef" question, has been mentioned elsewhere. Mr. Harmsworth, the British Hearst, and the yellowest journalist east of the New York Journal office, writes on some phases of modern newspaper making.

If one does not mind acquiring general information in pure and undisguised form, there is perhaps as much actual education to be gotten out of the Chautauquan as from any magazine published. Its Reading Journey in the Orient, for example, is full of those things which one wants to know about Egypt and Palestine—if he wants to know anything at all about them And the Critical Studies in French Literature and the series on World Politics of To-day are accurate and highly informing. The trouble is that the Chautauquan assumes on the part of its readers the mental attitude of a student. It assumes no information, but an interest in the subjects which unfortunately does not always exist, though, of course, it ought. The general reader relishes an assumption that he already knows something about the subject in hand. But for its purpose the Chautauquan is distinctly good and best of all when used in connection with the Chautauqua course of study.

Wise Landlady.

Understands How to Increase Her Business.

The landlady of a certain restaurant in Brockton, Mass., has increased her business so rapidly that she has had to enlarge her dining-room to accommodate the continually increasing patronage. One of her guests gives the reason.

"Every morning she serves her regular guests with Grape-Nuts and hot milk or hot cream in cold weather, and cold cream in summer. I began eating this food and right away began to feel an improvement in my health. I had been terribly troubled with nervousness and dyspepsia and found it impossible to find a food that would agree with me, until I began boarding at this restaurant.

"The new food in four months increased my weight from 120 pounds to 145 and I never felt as well in my life as I do now. There is something remarkable in the sustaining power of this food. I have never been able to obtain such results from any other." G. R. Hersey, 30 L Street, Brockton, Mass.

Our Budget.

—We knew you would like it—that New Century number.

—Thanks for your appreciation whether unuttered or expressed.

—We are also grateful for renewals and new subscriptions, the most tangible method of expressing appreciation.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is saying little in its own behalf, so crowded are its columns with good things for its readers. We must rely upon our friends and the merits of the paper to plead its cause.

—Give attention to the story which we began last week entitled "Evolution at Bartlett's Landing," the scene of which is laid in western Missouri. There is no reason why modern fiction should not light upon old Missouri for its material, and we are glad to see this son of Missouri cultivating this field.

—We almost owe an apology to our readers and especially to our contemporaries for giving so much valuable material for the price of the paper. It does look a little extravagant, but our readers want the best, and they appreciate the best, and what can we do but do our best to supply the demand, and trust an appreciative brotherhood to do the rest?

—Any one who does not know of the work which is being done by the School of the Evangelists at Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., and who wishes to read the story of an enterprise at once heroic and sensible, should send to President Ashley S. Johnson for a copy of his illustrated pamphlet, "The Story of a Check for $100," which tells how the gift of that sum by William F. Crippen led to the founding of the school.

—The time begins to approach for the preparation for the March offering for Foreign Missions. The demand is for $200,000 this year. As a part of this sum an effort is being made to secure 100,000 one-dollar volunteers; that is, to secure that number of persons who will increase their last year's contribution by at least $1.00. The work of our Foreign Society cannot expand as it ought with any smaller sum and the campaign of education leading up to the first Sunday in March cannot be started too soon.

—The Missouri Conference of Charities and Correction will be held in St. Louis, Jan. 10, 11. The discussion will cover the work of the state boards of charities and corrections and will deal with actual and desirable methods of providing for the deaf and dumb, the blind, the insane, the poor and the vicious. The program, which contains many notable names, promises an instructive and interesting discussion of important topics. Among the speakers are T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, and James McAllister, pastor of the Central Christian Church, St. Louis.

—A writer in the Universalist Leader (Boston) gives what he considers the "Reasons for a Universalist Church." He admits its "sympathetic oneness with its sister churches in the main purpose of its ministry" and makes much of the essential orthodoxy of universalism on all vital points. But his article will fail to convince any one who is not already convinced, that there is any necessity for a religious body which has no unique message to proclaim in regard to the character of God or the duty of man, but only a theory to maintain in regard to what will not happen to impenitent sinners. Universalism may have had a mission once when the character of God was so grossly misconceived that orthodox Christians commonly believed in the damnation of non-elect infants. But the necessity for Universalism's well-meant protest against this monstrous doctrine has passed away with the passing of the doctrine itself, and there is needed to-day a revision of the creed of liberalism no less than of the creed of Calvinism. One denies, while the other asserts, a doctrine which nobody really believes. Universalism as a denomination owes its continued existence to a persistent misconception of the position of orthodox Christianity and a refusal to see that Jonathan Edwards' famous sermon on "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" is no longer an expression of the highest faith of Protestant orthodoxy.

—We are glad to see that Drury College, in Springfield, Mo., has recently completed the raising of a fund of $45,000 to build a new Science Hall. Dr. Fuller, the president, deserves much credit for his persevering efforts in behalf of this new enterprise. Dr. Pearson, of Chicago, gave the last $25,000 on this new Hall. He is a liberal benefactor of this institution and will no doubt continue to be its friend. The students and friends of Drury had a celebration of this new achievement one day last week, and speeches were made by Dr. Fuller, Dr. Burnham, of St. Louis, and others. The students marched in procession through the streets and otherwise gave expression to their joy. Drury College is doing a fine work for the southwest, and is worthy of the patronage of the people throughout that vast section regardless of denominational lines.

—A man in Kansas who had been greatly addicted to lying has resolved to reform and has applied to the courts for a change of name. He has published a notice in the local paper to this effect, requesting the people to no longer call him by his old name, as he is a new man and is entitled to a new name. This is eccentric, but after all it seems to be appropriate that a new man should have a new name. Abraham, Sarah, Jacob, Peter and Paul are Bible illustrations of changed names, The New Testament meets this want by adding a new name to the old one, namely Christian. This name implies that the one who wears it is a follower of Christ. Disciple of Christ means the same. It is not necessary to change one's patronymic. It suffices to take a religious name that best expresses the source and character of the changed life.

—In commenting editorially on the numerous comments called forth by its recent editorial, entitled, "Not a Duty to Work out One's Own Salvation," the Sunday-school Times admits that many opinions have been expressed both pro and con. But when it comes to quoting opinions, it gives one two-line criticism and devotes a column and a half to reprinting eulogies upon the paper and its editor from admiring friends. We can agree in spirit with the eulogies which the editor quotes about his paper and himself, but after all that scarcely touches the main issue. The question is whether or not it is a duty to work out one's own salvation. The editor has expressed his opinion that it is not. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and a great many other papers have argued in reply that, in a very real sense, it is. For him to quote lengthy extracts from letters of three or four of his admiring friends who approve but do not argue, cannot strengthen the faithful or convince the erring. Of course, there is no law to compel an editor to defend himself, but if he is going to defend himself at all, it seems to us that he ought to do it by some more legitimate process than quoting the authority of three or four people who think as he does.

What are Humors?

They are vitiated or morbid fluids coursing the veins and affecting the tissues. They are commonly due to defective digestion but sometimes inherited.

How do they manifest themselves?

In many forms of cutaneous eruption, salt rheum or eczema, pimples and boils, and in weakness, languor and general debility.

How are they expelled? By

which also builds up the system that has suffered from them.

It is the best of all medicines for humors.

—The recent death of Prof. George W. Northrup, at the age of 74 years, removes a notable figure among the leaders of Baptist thought and among the theologians of our time. For 37 years he was connected with the University of Chicago and its predecessors, the old University of Chicago and the Morgan Park Theological Seminary, and it was largely through his personal influence that Mr. Rockefeller became interested in the endowment of the university. As a teacher of theology he was conspicuous for his openmindedness, his breadth of scholarship and his reverence. Never in any sense a radical, he has for many years been recognized as one of the ablest advocates of liberal and progressive ideas in his denomination. Strangely enough, he has never published a book, but his influence for good has gone abroad through the work of hundreds of ministers who have been his students.

The above excellent report shows that the receipts for Home Missions during the past quarter exceed those of the corresponding quarter of 1899 more than $13,000. The number of regular contributions from churches and individuals has decreased, as has also the amount received from these sources. The increase is in annuities, bequests and special contributions, especially the first. The society received a New Year's present of $500 on the annuity plan, not included in the above. Such a straightforward, businesslike plan, operated by a society which has all the financial stability of a trust company, is sure to be increasingly popular. In estimating the resources of the society, however, it must be borne in mind that this more than doubling of receipts does not mean a doubling of immediately available funds. An annuity fund is a source of expense to the society during the lifetime of the donor.

—Nothing more impressive in the way of religious services has the writer ever witnessed than the closing moments of the watch-night service at the Central Christian Church in this city on the last night of the old year. Beginning at nine o'clock a large audience filled the basement of the Central Christian Church. Brother Davies Pittman, chairman of the committee appointed for the purpose, submitted the constitution and by-laws for a Christian Church Circle in the city for the purpose of mutual acquaintanceship, mutual edification and mutual helpfulness in the exchange of methods of church work, etc. These were adopted and the preliminary steps taken to form the organization. The circle is to hold bi-monthly meetings, at which some prominent speaker is to deliver an address, a chorus choir of fifty voices is to sing, together with other interesting features. After this item of business the Endeavor Societies represented conducted a devotional meeting. Then the audience adjourned upstairs to the main auditorium, where a large chorus choir discoursed beautiful music between the various parts of the program. After a scripture reading, and prayer by W. A. Moore, of the Beulah Church, addresses were delivered by Sherman B. Moore of Compton Heights on "What Hath God Wrought During the Century," by A. J. Marshall, city evangelist, on "Christ's Influence in the Formation of Character," and by F. O. Fannon on "The Supreme Need of the Hour." These were stirring speeches. The Lord's Supper was then observed, F. G. Tyrrell and W. F. Hamann presiding. The awe that seemed to rest upon the congregation was most impressive. When this was closed there remained five minutes before the old century should pass out and the new should enter. The leader called attention to these brief moments, laden with so many prayers, so many hopes and aspirations, and asked all to bow in prayer that we might meet the new century on our knees, consecrating ourselves to the service of God. While thus bowed, and after a few moments of silent prayer, followed by a few words of audible prayer by the leader, the whole audience, led by the choir and organ, sang softly and solemnly "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Just at the close of the last minute of the old year, the congregation rose and sang the doxology and was dismissed by a solemn prayer of consecration by Brother McAllister. New Year's greetings were then exchanged and the congregation separated to their homes, feeling they had spent the closing hours of the century in a most profitable manner.

—The church at Fayetteville, Ark., has remodeled, rebuilt, enlarged and improved its church building until it is to all intents and purposes a new edifice. They have refurnished it with modern pews, beautiful carpet, and adapted it to the uses of the modern church. The editor of this paper was with them on last Lord's day, the first Lord's day of the new century, when the building was first occupied in its improved form, and was formally dedicated to the worship of God. It was a delight to preach to the large and attentive audiences which gathered morning and evening. There was also an afternoon union service in which addresses were made by various local pastors and by Dr. Buchanan, President of the State University located at Fayetteville. The congratulations of these local ministers were hearty and the spirit of fraternity among the churches is very beautiful. Brother Ragland, who is in his 16th year as pastor of this congregation, and whom we believe the church has called for life, has endeared himself not only to his own congregation, but to the entire population of the town without respect to denominational lines. There are a few additions to make to the church yet before it is completed, and when these are added the building will be a worthy home for this old, historic congregation, which has passed its half century mark some years ago. The improvements have cost about $4,500, nearly all of which had been raised beforehand. The church contains many of the best people of the town and community, and one cannot fail to see in the church and in the State University the fruits of the labors in the long ago of Bro. Robert Graham, who gave the strength of his young manhood for several years in laying the foundations of the church and school of this city. The church now stands on the ground originally occupied by the Arkansas College, the school founded by Brother Graham, and which subsequently grew into the State University. The church in its new home, with its faithful and loved pastor, united and devoted to the work, has a bright future. It was a pleasure to us to meet with many whom we had known before, and especially with our dear friends, Brother B. R. Davidson and wife, whose beautiful and hospitable home we shared while there.

You Should Not Neglect Your Kidneys

Because at all Times They Have The Most Important Work to Do.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for more sickness and suffering than any other disease, and if permitted to continue fatal results are sure to follow.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work.

So when your kidneys are weak or out of order you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

DES MOINES, IA., Oct. 20, 1900.

"I had been out of health for a long time, and I was taking medicine from a doctor's prescription when I received your sample bottle. I stopped taking the doctor's medicine and used the sample bottle of Swamp-Root. I afterwards took two of your large bottles, and it cured me entirely, and I have not felt so well for years. I thank you very much for sending me the sample bottle."

What a Woman Says of Swamp-Root.

Mrs. H. N. Wheeler, of 117 High Rock St., Lynn, Mass., writes on Nov. 2nd, 1900: "About 18 months ago I had a very severe attack of grip. I was extremely sick for three weeks, and when I finally was able to leave my bed I was left with excruciating pains in my back. My water at times looked very like coffee. I could pass but little at a time, and then only after suffering great pain. My physical condition was such that I had no strength and was all run down. The doctors said my kidneys were not affected, but I felt certain that they were the cause of my trouble. My sister, Mrs. C. E. Littlefield, of Lynn, advised me to give Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root a trial. I procured a bottle from my druggist, and found it a very pleasant medicine to take, and inside of three days commenced to get relief. I followed up that bottle with another, and at the completion of this one found I was completely cured. My strength returned, and to-day I am as well as ever. My business is that of canvasser, I am on my feet a great deal of the time and have to use much energy in getting around. My cure is therefore all the more remarkable, and is exceedingly gratifying to me."

MRS. H. N. WHEELER.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince you—and you may have a sample bottle free for the asking.

When your kidneys are not doing their work, some of the symptoms which prove it to you are pain or dull ache in the back, excess of uric acid, gravel, rheumatic pains, sediment in the urine, scanty supply, scalding irritation in passing it, obliged to go often during the day and to get up many times during the night to empty the bladder; sleeplessness, nervous irritability, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, loss of ambition, general weakness and debility.

Swamp-Root is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

Sample Bottle Free. To prove its wonderful curative properties, send your name and address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., when you will receive, free of all charge, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a valuable book by mail, prepaid. This book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women who owe their good health, in fact their very lives, to the wonderful curative properties of this world-famous kidney remedy. Swamp-Root is pleasant to take, and is so remarkably successful that those of our readers who have not already tried it are advised to write for a sample bottle, and to be sure and mention reading this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take, and if you are already convinced that this great remedy is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

—Our neighbor, the St. Louis Christian Advocate, in its issue of Dec. 26th, celebrates its fiftieth anniversary in a jubilee number. This number contains letters from Bishops, pastors and editors of various religious journals, extending congratulations to the Advocate on having reached this advanced newspaper age, and on the good it has accomplished. Dr. Palmore, the present editor, is to be congratulated on the success of the paper under his management, and especially on its bold and fearless course on all questions of social reform and of public morality. May it live a hundred years and increase in usefulness!

—The Westfield (N. J.) Republican publishes a somewhat unique platform, which exhibits a conviction that politics and religion are not mutually incompatible; as follows:

We stand for and support the principles of the Republican party.

We aim to give all the good news of Westfield and vicinity.

We promote the work of spreading and teaching the Scriptures, as conducted by the Disciples' Mission.

For our own part we prefer to maintain a strictly non-partisan standpoint rather than to declare allegiance to any political party. We do this personally as well as editorially. But the fundamental idea that religion is not a thing apart from the concerns of this world is worthy of approval. The sooner the secular editor learns that religious events have an importance quite equal to those in the spheres of politics, literature and art, and the sooner the religious editor learns that religion is not a little section of life set off by itself, but a method of living and a way of handling all the complex material of the political, commercial and social world, the more rapidly will we approach the ideal of journalism. The twentieth century, if we mistake not, will witness long strides in this direction.

—We regret to learn from a personal letter and newspaper clipping of the sudden death of Brother George Gourlay, of Detroit, Mich., on the 8th of December. He was the manager of the Gourlay Brothers Furnishing House in that city, there being three brothers of them together, George, James and Alfred L. He had left his store in usual health and in unusual spirits on the evening before, and soon after rising the next morning he was taken with sudden pain, and died in fifteen minutes. It is thought that his immediate death resulted from the bursting of a blood-vessel in the brain. He was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, January 7, 1834, and attended the schools of that city until he was twelve years of age. He came to Detroit in 1878 and has lived and labored there ever since. He and his brothers were members of the Plum Street Church of Christ in Detroit. The three brothers and their sister, Miss Margaret, were noted for their musical ability. The editor of this paper will never forget an evening spent at their home in company with Professor Loos and others, listening to their marvelous rendering of sweet Scottish airs. We have never attended any musical concert which we enjoyed more. Since then we have always known and loved the family for their devotion to the cause of Christ. On the evening before his death, George Gourlay had written the following unfinished paragraph, which his brothers have kindly sent to us, and which was intended to suggest a thought for one of his brethren who was to speak to a few Christian people in a house-to-house meeting:

"It is just here we learn the true secret of Christ's power—'love one another as I have loved you.' Do unto others as we would that others should do unto us, has the shadow of self brooding over it, because it measures man with man, but this new commandment is supremely greater because it measures us by Christ, raises us up and makes us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and it is only by service we get promotion. 'Freely you have received, freely give,' becomes the open sesame to God's favor, it makes us stronger in all virtue and all goodness, shining as lights, we brighten homes, gladden hearts. It inspires our singing and our songs, it bids us relieve the oppressed, and wipe tears from the face of sorrow. Thus we can be eyes for the blind and feet for the lame. Oh blessed fellowship, that exalts us as messengers and ministers of grace. Christ calls us to-day to this service and thus to reproduce the Church of Christ in all its pristine vigor, not by thought, not by word alone, but by deeds. This is the true test of discipleship. Let us then, brethren, continue steadfast in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and in prayers and so hasten the time when ——"

Thus to the last our brother was thinking and working for his Master. How sudden was the call! What a lesson it reads to us all to be ready and about our Father's business, for in such an hour as we think not, we may be summoned to go hence. We tender our sincere sympathies to the bereaved brothers and sister, and to the church of which he was a faithful member.

—A querist quotes from the Biblical World this statement: "It is not often necessary for the members of the kingdom of God to turn revolutionists," and asks if it is not true that Jesus was a revolutionist. No. Jesus was not a revolutionist. He did not rise against a corrupt and oppressive Roman government. He paid tribute to Cæsar. He refused to head a patriotic movement at the head of which the populace wished to place him. He was not a social revolutionist, for he did not try at once to do away with slavery or war or poverty. He was not a religious revolutionist, for he and his followers remained in Judaism; the next generation gradually withdrew. Jesus taught principles which led and will lead to political and social and religious transformation, but his method was not that of revolution.

—It will be remembered that several weeks ago an appeal was published in this paper by Brother H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines, Ia., and endorsed by this paper, for the raising of a fund to defray the expenses of Brother Baghdasarian and family from Persia to this country. Brother W. W. Williams, 720 Grand Avenue, Des Moines, Ia., who was made treasurer of the fund, has just submitted to us the following report:

W. W. WILLIAMS, Treasurer.

When we consider the circumstances under which Brother Baghdasarian was sent to Persia by the brethren of Iowa, and the condition in which he is reported to be, not only by himself but by the American consul near him, it is rather remarkable that there has not been a more ready and generous response to this appeal. Brother Baghdasarian is in a state of mental distress and of anxiety which is perhaps difficult for us to realize, and he is wholly dependent upon the good will and generosity of the brethren in this country who know him, or know of him, to furnish the means by which he may extricate himself from this trying situation. Surely the sense of obligation we are under to a brother in distress should prompt us at once to raise the amount necessary to pay the expenses of Brother B's return to this country with his family. We call attention once more to the imperative nature of this appeal and ask the generous-hearted and humane to respond at once, directing their contributions to the treasurer, as above, who will acknowledge the receipts through this paper.

F. E. Meigs.

The subject of this brief sketch, whose picture will be found on our first page, was born in Delaware County, New York, May 3, 1851. The family removed to Wisconsin in 1854. His father was a Methodist and his mother a Baptist. He became a Christian at the age of 11. He worked on the farm with his father in the farming season, and attended the country school in the winter. He began teaching in the public schools at the age of 18 and used the means thus obtained in securing further education. He is not a graduate of any college, but has had a long experience in teaching, during which time he pursued his studies under private tutors. In 1871 he located in Johnson County, Missouri, where he taught school. He also taught later in Fulton, Calloway County, and has always been considered a success in the work of teaching. He was married to Miss Martha A. Redford in May, 1873. Three children have been born to them, one of whom died in 1876, and the other two have been born in the foreign mission field. He united with the Disciples of Christ in 1872, and began preaching in 1876, and continued teaching and preaching until 1882, when he was called to a pastorate at Holden, Missouri. He resigned the pastorate at Holden to accept the position of Sunday-school Evangelist in Missouri in the summer of 1882, and continued in this position until June, 1887, when he resigned to go to China. Since that time he has represented the Foreign Christian Missionary Society in China. He is Principal of Christian College at Nankin, China. He is now on a furlough in this country for the second time, and expects to return to China in the spring. Bro. Meigs' work as a teacher and a preacher, and as a missionary, has been marked by practical wisdom and good, strong common sense, together with a single-hearted devotion to his great life-work, that of advancing the kingdom of God. His addresses on China indicate wide information concerning its history, its people, and its present condition and outlook. He is still in the vigor of his manhood, with the promise of many years of usefulness yet before him. Elsewhere in this issue will be found an article from his pen, written at our request, on "Li Hung Chang," who, just now, as for many years past, is occupying a prominent position in China.

Nailed the Chap.

Her Father in the Same Mind.

"I never thought for one moment that coffee was the cause of my worn-out feeling and dull headaches and energy all gone, until I began to notice that my bad feelings came on every morning after drinking coffee for breakfast, no matter how well I felt when I got up.

"I began to think the subject over and finally decided to try Postum Food Coffee in place of common coffee and see if it was coffee that was hurting me. After making the change, I discovered, to my delight, that the headache and worn-out feeling did not come on after breakfast.

"After a thorough trial I am fully convinced that coffee was the cause of my trouble, and that leaving it off and using Postum Food Coffee has restored me to health.

"My father, who has had very poor health for several years, quit coffee some time ago and began using Postum in place of it. It would surprise anyone to see how much he has improved.

"When I boil Postum twenty minutes and serve it immediately while it is hot, with good, rich cream, I think it far excels any coffee.

"Please do not print my name."

Notes and News.

R. D. Osborn, recently of Springfield, Ill., and now at Hale, Mo., would like to communicate with a church needing a pastor or the services of an evangelist.

R. J. Bamber, 6601 Tennis St., East End, Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "I can locate a good, earnest, hustling pastor with a new and promising church in a splendid field in Pittsburg, Pa. Young man preferred. Address at once."

The old Pleasant Hill Church in Franklin County is building a new church house at Villa Ridge on the railroad from St. Louis to Union. It is expected that the new building will be ready for dedication in the spring.

E. F. Mahan, of Shelbyville, Ind., writes: "In response to the appeal by Z. T. Sweeney, $10,000 were subscribed for a new church here to-day. This means a $15,000 building for Shelbyville. Everything is booming here."

A. E. Zeigler, who has been minister at Huntington, W. Va., nearly seven years, has accepted a call to Hazelwood Church, Pittsburg, Pa. A call has been extended by the Huntington Church to Bro. J. E. Stone, of Bluefield, W. Va.

The East Eighth Street Church of Los Angeles, Cal., of which H. Elliott Ward is pastor, held a watch service on New Year's eve, with a sermon by J. W. Ingram. The pastor's annual report shows 78 additions to the church during the year.

J. W. Lowber is delivering a course of lectures in the interest of the students of the University of Texas, on "Marriage and the Family," in preparation for which he is taking a course of study on "The Family" under Dr. Henderson of the University of Chicago.

On December 26, the marriage of Mr. Hugh Thomas Miller and Miss Nettie Irwin Sweeney, only daughter of Z. T. Sweeney, occurred at Columbus, Ind. Mr. Miller was for several years professor of history in Butler College. Mrs. Miller was graduated from Butler College in 1897.

We are glad to announce that Bro. B. B. Tyler is regaining his health. He writes with his own hand that he expected to preach Jan. 6, the first time since Dec. 16. He will resume his letters in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, probably next week.

Several of the churches and ministers have issued cards of Twentieth Century greeting, bearing messages appropriate to the season. Such have been received from E. A. Cantrell of Washington, Ind., John G. M. Luttenberger of Dorchester, Ill., Clark Braden of Cairo, Ill., and James H. Mohorter of Boston, Mass.

J. C. Coggins, of Decatur, Ill., writes: "On Dec. 30, Bro. Harry Dill, a young man of exemplary life and studious habits, after a six years' course of preparation, was scripturally ordained at the Christian Tabernacle to the ministry of the gospel. His ordination service was witnessed by some members of the Ashgrove church where Bro. Dill has been employed as pastor."

The Pacific Commercial Advertiser, of Honolulu, in commenting editorially on the departure of Bro. J. C. Hay from Hawaii, says: "The departure of Bro. J. C. Hay of the Christian Church will deprive Honolulu of a clergyman whose influence has been of the best. Without ostentation or display he has done good wherever a wise act or a word fitly spoken could do it."

The church at Jacksonville, Fla., of which J. T. Boone is pastor, has recently purchased a lot on the corner of Hogan and Monroe streets, one of the most desirable sites in the city, and will soon build a new house. The church is in a flourishing condition and its present building is entirely inadequate. The price paid for the lot was $7,500.

F. L. Davis, of Tama, Iowa, writes that the financial condition of the church there makes it necessary for him to close his work and he will hold a few meetings before locating again. He will go to any place in the United States; terms reasonable. For particulars, address him as above.

J. S. Hughes, "of Patmos," writes as follows under date of Jan. 1: "I prophesy on this, the first day of the new century, that the Revelation of St. John will be studied as never before in all the centuries past and that its light will lead in bringing about the millennium of regeneration and that the time is near at hand for a great reformation."

Mrs. J. K. Hausbrough, corresponding secretary of the Benevolent Association, informs us that her appeal for 100 contributors to give a Christmas present of $5.00 each to the Orphans' Home brought only about $100. It is not too late yet. Call it a belated New Year's present or anything you please—but send the money. The Home needs it. The address is 5018 Cabanne Ave., St. Louis.

J. D. Dillard, field representative of the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, is starting on a four weeks' tour in Missouri in the interest of the Orphans' Home, located in St. Louis. It will be a great favor if all who have made pledges to that work will pay them promptly within the present month without waiting to be asked. The expenses are in the neighborhood of $500 a month and, as there is no endowment, any falling off in current receipts seriously embarrasses the work.

Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind., announces that he has decided to issue Pulpit Diagrams on heavy book paper, 40x60 inches, suitable for large audiences. They will be lithographs of the finest style. The following subjects are now being prepared: Relations; New Testament Baptisms; Periods and Events; The Abrahamic Covenant; Bible Plan of Salvation; New Testament Church; and others will soon follow. A special advance price will be made to parties interested if they will address Bro. Sweeney at once.

The Board of Church Extension has just received $13,000 on the annuity plan from W. F. Goodhue and his wife, Alice A. Goodhue, of Westport, Ky. This is the largest single annuity gift that any of our missionary societies has thus far received. The Church Extension Board has received about $25,000 in new receipts since the 1st of October, which began the new missionary year, and there is now $275,000 in our Church Extension Fund. This is a splendid start for the half million dollars to be reached by 1905, as recommended by the Kansas City National Convention last October.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—Need I say that the sensational reports of secular newspapers as to the abandonment of the prayer-meeting by the Kansas City ministers are altogether misleading and criticisms based thereon wholly gratuitous. The Alliance never for a moment contemplated the abandonment of this meeting but did voice the sentiment that this service needed freshening and enlarging. For this latter purpose a committee was appointed. It seems strange that those who saw this sensational report should not also have seen the correction over the signature of W. F. Richardson. And it seems strange, too, even if no correction had been made, that upon the basis of a newspaper article the faith in prayer of men like Haley, Cave, Richardson, should be questioned. Must one deny every silly newspaper report or have his loyalty to Christ and Christ's cause questioned? A little more of charity and a little less of censorship would be vastly more becoming to us all.

Yours truly and sincerely,
GEORGE H. COMBS.

Kansas City, Mo., Jan. 3, 1901.

Time is Life

The father? Gone for the doctor. The mother? Alone with her suffering child. Will the doctor never come? When there's croup in the house you can't get the doctor quick enough. It's too dangerous to wait. Don't make such a mistake again; it may cost a life. Always keep on hand a dollar bottle of

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral

It cures the croup at once. For bronchitis, whooping-cough, hoarseness, asthma, pleurisy, weak lungs, loss of voice, and consumption, there is no remedy its equal. A 25c. bottle will cure a miserable cold; the 50c. size is better for a cold that has been hanging on. But the dollar bottle is more economical in the long run.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of January 3rd is at hand and I note the editorial item, and the communication of Bro. Clayton Keith, in reference to the reported action of the Kansas City preachers in voting to abolish the prayer-meeting. You are correct in your conjecture, that the report is due to the exaggeration of the reporter, and not to any basis in fact. No such action as indicated was taken, or even thought of. Following a discussion on how to improve the midweek meeting in our congregations, the following resolution was adopted "Resolved, that a committee, composed Bros. Combs, Richardson and Cave, be appointed to outline a program for the midweek meetings for the space of three months." Out of this the reporter of one of our city papers made the sensational article which has led to all this stir. A correction was at once sent to the paper, but in accordance with what seems to be its present policy the correction was refused a place in its columns. A brief interview with one of our pastors, in which he expressed in a sentence or two his purpose to make some radical changes in his meeting, was distorted into the long and extravagant interview as published. Speaking for the Christian ministers of this city, I can say that the prayer-meeting is appreciated as fully as ever, as a means for the spiritual growth of the church. We only intend to make it more interesting and more helpful to the people. I have begun a series of Bible studies, to occupy a part of the Wednesday evening hour, and this is about as radical action as most of us will take, I think. This is surely not heresy. W. F. RICHARDSON.

Jan. 4, 1901.

[The above letters by Bros. Combs and Richardson explain themselves and justify the assertion which we made last week that the Kansas City preachers certainly had not voted to abolish the prayer-meeting. We were sure of this, partly because we knew that Bros. Richardson and Combs are in Kansas City. EDITOR.]

Washington (D. C.) Letter.

The new century opens auspiciously for our churches in this section. If the ratio of increase of the past ten years continues, the beginning of the next century will find us in the lead among the religious forces of the Capital City. As an indication of the drift of things, the field worker employed by the District of Columbia Sunday-school Union reported at a recent convention that of all the denominational schools those of the Christian churches had made the largest gains during the past year. The increase in the enrollment in our schools was 25 per cent., while for the whole district the increase was six per cent. The Ninth Street Christian, with 531 enrolled, is now the eighth school in the city. There have been 20 additions to this church since Oct. 1. Our C. E. Society has opened a mission in Rosedale. A flourishing Sunday-school is maintained and gospel meetings are held on Wednesday and Sunday evenings. We have a half-dozen young men who take turns in preaching at this mission. Several additions have been gained and some embryonic preachers are in process of development.

Interest in the Bethany Beach Assembly on the Delaware coast is greater than the most sanguine of us had anticipated. Letters are pouring in from all quarters and lots are selling rapidly. The offer of the company to donate to our Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia convention thirteen acres of ground and build us a tabernacle to cost not less than $3,000, was conditioned upon the sale of one hundred lots. This condition has been met and our committee has outlined a program for the assembly next summer. The tabernacle will be opened July 4 with a patriotic service, address by the governor of the state, etc. It is probable that G. W. Coler, of Ann Arbor, will give the daily Bible lectures, and W H. Book, of Virginia, will hold a series of evangelistic meetings. F. D. Power is chairman of the program committee and R. R. Bulgin, late pastor of the Scranton, Pa., Church, is business manager. His address is Millville, Del.

The churches of Baltimore are enjoying a steady and healthful growth. Peter Ainslie is delighted with a gift of $500 for his St. Paul Street Mission. He will erect soon a $1,500 chapel on leased ground. John Troy, the assistant pastor of the Calhoun Street Church, will have charge of this mission. There is a well-founded rumor that W. S. Hoye, who has served so long and faithfully the church at Beaver Creek, Md., received a Christmas present of $5,000 for a new house o worship at that place.

The churches in Washington are greatly pleased with C. C. Redgrave's lecture, "In the Footsteps of the Pioneers." The Ninth St. Church has had several lecture courses and heard some of the most prominent men in public life, but rarely have we listened to a lecture so unique, entertaining and convincing as that of Bro. Redgrave.

F. D. Power enjoys his lecture tours and always returns with something good to say of the people and places he visits, though I have never heard him so enthusiastic as in his praise of Texas, on returning from a trip to that great state. He says, "I never saw a finer lot of preachers. They are men of good ability, thorough piety, clean and clever."

Texas Letter.

We believe that a new and better era for Texas dawned with the new century, and our faith rests on the following facts. Congress has agreed upon these appropriations for our waterways: Galveston harbor, $1,500,000; Galveston ship canal and Buffalo Bayou, $600,000; Trinity River, $750,000; Aransas Pass, $350,000; Sabine Pass, $125,000; mouth of Brazos River, $30,000; Brazos River from mouth to Velasco, $50,000; Neches and Sabine Rivers, $5,000; grand total, $3,410,000. After this most liberal appropriation surely there cannot be found a man in the state who will claim that we are neglected in the councils at Washington.

This gift to Galveston shows that that port is no longer to be regarded as a state affair, but as a national institution. This is right, for it is the doorway to the seas for a vast area of productive country, and without it this territory would be well-nigh ruined. And that this port deserves this handsome recognition is apparent in the fact that in spite of the recent terrible storms, with the attendant loss of life and property, and the stagnation of business, the imports for November are the highest in her history. Surely such a history under such circumstances deserves national notice and support.

The appropriation for the Trinity River is also of special interest. In the seventies the steamboat whistle on this stream was a familiar sound, but it gradually disappeared. In 1892 the Trinity Navigation Company was formed. One year later the steamer Harvey came up the river from its mouth and anchored right in the heart of Dallas, and it was greeted by perhaps the largest crowd that ever assembled in the city. An immense parade traversed our streets, after which the participants feasted upon a free dinner.

The Harvey, after plying between Dallas and points down the river for a year or two, made her way back to the Gulf and we have not seen her since. But she had done valuable service in demonstrating the fact that a steamer could make her way from Galveston to Dallas and return, and this demonstration bore fruit in attracting the attention of Congress, which ordered a survey of the river from the Gulf to Dallas, and the report of the United States engineer was that the Trinity could be made navigable between these points with six feet of water. And now comes this handsome appropriation, and our people are rejoicing that at last we are to have "water rates," an almost absolute necessity in the building of a city.

But sad to say the spiritual outlook is not so bright. It is strange that as God fills our coffers we so often grow lean of soul. We seem in the main to be in a state of lukewarmness. But many of God's saints are praying for an awakening, and we are hopeful.

Once more I am simply a pastor. For the last four months I have been both editor and pastor. On September 1 the Christian Courier lost its editor, W. K. Homan, which, coupled with financial distress, threatened the safety of our paper. The directors urged me to come to the rescue in this emergency, and I did so; and I am grateful to say that the Courier, without a dollar of debt and in a healthy spiritual condition, on January 1 was turned over to G. A. Faris as editor and publisher. The double work of my large pastorate of 1,000 members, and the editorial and business management of the paper, is too much for one man, and I gladly surrender the one and return wholly to the other. Bro. Faris is a strong man and a versatile writer, and we look for a splendid paper under his guidance.

GLUTTONY

Is more common than we may think, if we define gluttony as eating beyond the body's need of sustenance and beyond the stomach's capacity for digestion and assimilation of food. That is a fair definition, and it fastens the name glutton on many a person who would resent the term as an insult. The fact of this gluttony is marked by its consequences. The overloaded stomach becomes diseased. The popular term for the condition is "weak" stomach. The "weak" stomach fails in furnishing adequate nutrition for the body, and soon the "weakness" spreads from the stomach to other organs.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. It enables the perfect assimilation of food, by which alone the health and strength of the body is maintained.

"Your medicine helped me so much that I cannot praise it too highly," writes Mrs. C. L. Brooks, of Poland, Androscoggin Co., Me. "The first dose I took helped me. I cannot forget how I felt when I took it; I was suffering everything with indigestion, and my stomach was so bloated that it seemed as though it must burst. My husband said he was going for the doctor, but I said if he would get me a bottle of the 'Golden Medical Discovery' I would try that. I had not taken it long when I felt relieved, and have not had a touch of indigestion or stomach trouble since. I had been sick for four years, and less than four bottles cured me. Some people that knew me before I began to take the 'Golden Medical Discovery' tell me that they never saw such a change in any one, and they also say they don't see how I can do such large washings as I do now, when I had not done a washing for so long."

Dr. Pierce's Pellets cure biliousness.

Illinois Notes.

Our Bible-school superintendent, A. C. Roach, is now settled at Wyoming, where he is organizing a mission. He will add three others at neighboring points and push them until they become churches. All superintendents should see that their schools answer his calls for support. Brethren generally are cordially approving the plan.

O. D. Maple, Cameron, followed the dedication of the church with a series of meetings, which resulted in thirty-six conversions and five other additions. He is doing a fine service for this church.

Leroy has had a fine meeting with twenty-five conversions and twelve other additions. The minister, F. A. Sword, was assisted by A. P. Cobb and E. B. Barnes, and he did some of the preaching himself.

J. W. Knight will begin a meeting at Ashland, and the district will then aid in keeping a preacher there. Simpson Ely begins for us at Rood House, and R. Leland Brown at Cowden. Other meetings are planned, and we wait for your offerings in order to pay the workers. Our state and district service brought in one-half of the net gain to the churches in the state last year. This shows how well the money is used.

When you read this the Second Church, Danville, will have dedicated its building. This church is one of our children.

During the last five years' work done by our board there has been no failure in our missions. Every one has now a good building except Rockford, and we only took that mission up last year. It is the policy of the board to hold on to the missions until they are housed. There is no wisdom in organizing a church and then leaving it to perish.

If we raise $10,000 this year the churches will need to give our cause a place in their plans. Offerings to this work ought to be made a matter of certainty rather than accident. Let us have your help now and then we will be out of the way of the days for home and foreign offerings. J. FRED JONES, Sec.
Stanford.

Missouri Mission Notes.

Next Lord's day, Jan. 13, 1901, is the day when the churches of Missouri are expected to roll up the biggest collection for State Missions that was ever obtained within its borders. This is not an unreasonable expectation by any means. Why not? We are stronger, in every way, in numbers and in wealth, and we ought to be growing in the grace of liberality. We are asking that $10,000 be contributed to State Missions this year. If we were a feeble folk this might be too much to ask, but it would be a woeful lack of confidence in the greatness of our people, in their consecration or liberality, for us to ask or expect any less. The time has come when we cannot afford to ask for small things to do large things with. We must ask for large things because we are asking from a large people and for the greatest of all possible purposes.

Look again at the work that was done by the State Board last year. We give it only in summary; the details are written only on the books of him who notes all things done by his faithful ones.

Men employed	33
Days service	7023
Sermons	5216
Other services	1519
Churches organized	44
Bible-schools organized	77
Additions	2807
Money contributed	$ 5561
Total money raised for all purposes	$ 67971

Every two dollars contributed brought one soul into the kingdom. What a glorious investment. For every $1.25 given a congregation was organized, and in nearly every case a house of worship built. Every dollar given brought $12 more into service. No other church on earth can make such a showing for the money given. God's blessing has surely been ours.

For sixty-three years has this work gone on. In that time it has organized 757 congregations; baptized 34,292, added otherwise 25,976, bringing into the church a total of 60,268. Our mission work in Missouri has been the very largest factor in our wonderful development. Our 1,648 churches, our 168,455 members have come to us largely because of this organized force which, not only directly through its men in the field, but indirectly also, through the advice of the board, its secretaries and evangelists, and by the inspiration of its own success, is inciting the churches to larger efforts for the upbuilding of our cause.

With such a record we would be recreant to our trust, disloyal to our great plea, and, above all, we would dishonor our God by our hesitancy, if we tarried by the way. Every incentive bids us on; the success of the past, present conditions, future possibilities, the hand of God—all beckon us on. Surely with such motives none will draw back.

The Moberly convention instructed us to ask for $10,000. Our motto for 1901 is, "$10,000 for State Missions; 10,000 Souls for Christ in Missouri!" Our workers are in the field seeking for the souls of men. From every side comes the news of great successes, souls saved, congregations assisted or established. The call comes for more reapers. Those in the field are calling for reinforcements. Men, more men, is the need of the hour.

But this need can only be supplied as we have the means. We ask therefore for this collection that you may make it the greatest ever raised in Missouri. Make it great in harmony with our plea; great in harmony with the great success of the past and the great need of the present. Above all make it great that it may be in tune with the great love of the great God who made such a great sacrifice that we might be saved with such a great salvation.

Colorado Springs, Col., Dec. 31.—There have been 93 additions to the church here since I came last April.—F. N. CALVIN.

Boulder, Col., Dec. 31.—Closed another year's work with the Boulder church. Eighteen have been added by confession and baptism; 26 by commendation. About $1800 has been raised for all purposes, $181 being for missions. A short meeting was held in Nov., Bro. H. A. Davis, of Denver, assisting. During the five years of the present pastorate the membership has grown from 118 to 234—100 per cent. In all 229 additions have been made, 75 being baptized. More than $12,000 has been raised for all purposes.—J. E. PICKETT.

Jacksonville, Fla., Jan. 1.—We had one of the best audiences of the year at our services the last Lord's day evening of 1900, and one more confession.—T. H. BLENUS, pastor Adams St. Christian Church.

Ashley, Ill., Jan. 1.—Closed the year 1900 at Mulkeytown, Ill., on last Lord's day. One young lady made the good confession and was baptized. Married a couple at 2 P. M., Mr. Charley Pharis, of East St. Louis, and Miss Annie Brown, of Mulkeytown, Ill. I have preached over 200 sermons, received into the church 35, helped in four protracted meetings. Have been re-employed by the churches at Mulkeytown, Ill., Gaston Grove, Ill., and Young's Chapel for another year.—F. M. MORGAN.

Roseville, Ill., Dec. 31.—Our meeting closed Dec. 23, with eight additions, the church greatly strengthened and spiritualized, and much good seed sown in the community. Bro. J. W. Camp, of Concord, did the preaching. —J. F. FISHER, elder.

Chicago, Ill., Jan. 6.—On this first Lord's day morning of the new century, Bro. Kindred took the confession of six persons and received four others by relation; it being the largest number that ever came forward at any single ordinary service in the history of the Englewood Church.—W. P. KEELER.

Watseka, Ill., Dec. 31.—Two more persons responded to the gospel invitation at our Lord's day services, one being a bright young man who is pursuing a course of study at the M. E. Seminary at Onarga, Ill. We hold a twentieth century watch meeting to-night, and shall have a baptismal service at 12 o'clock—B. S. FERRALL, pastor.

Cameron, Ill., Dec. 31.—As a prelude to a protracted meeting I followed the dedication of new house with nine chart lectures. Followed these with 20 sermons with the following results: By primary obedience, 36; by statement, 5; total, 41. Meeting closed Dec. 25. The Cameron Church is 70 years old and the ground has been well worked.—O. D. MAPLE.

Chicago, Ill.—G. A. Ragan closed his two years' ministry in Irving Park, Sunday, Dec. 30. During his brief pastorate there have been 58 additions to the church, nearly doubling the membership. Although the church is but little over two years old it has built and paid for a comfortable church house and made a substantial payment on the lot. The church is well organized in all departments for Christian work. W. B. Taylor will supply until a new pastor is located. Ex-pastor Ragan will spend a few months in the evangelistic field. After holding meetings in Batavia, Ill., and Ottumwa, Ia., he will join his family in California.

Le Roy, Ill., Jan. 1.—Meeting of 30 days closed last night. Thirty-seven accessions; 13 men, six of whom are heads of families. Ten new families were reached where we had no members; 25 baptisms, 12 by letter and statement. Three of the number baptized were M. E's. and one by statement was a Baptist. There have been 70 accessions to the church since we took the work 15 months ago. —F. A. SWORD, pastor.

Chicago, Jan. 1.—Watch-night meeting at our Englewood church was signalized by the announcement of the complete success of the movement recently headed by our energetic pastor, C. G. Kindred, to pay off the remainder of the property debt, $843, including interest. Sufficient additional cash was secured to cancel all current expense obligations also, leaving us better equipped than we have ever been and full of hope on entering upon the new century. There have been about 100 accessions to our membership during the past year; 40 conversions, and of this number 31 came from the Sunday-school. The school observed its fourth quarterly Decision Day last Sunday, with three confessions from among the scholars—two of these being the daughters (Myrtle, aged 12, and Mabel, 15,) of the superintendent, Orin Stanford, who, at the completion of this his third year as superintendent, gives place to Bro. Clark Orr.—W. P. KEELER.

Peoria, Ill., Dec. 31.—About two weeks ago we planned a general rally for the last Sunday of the century and set every one to work in an earnest effort to have 25 new members at the morning service as a crown of the century. Yesterday morning we received 29 new members. The work prospers in all lines. We are giving two Sunday evenings to the discussion of nineteenth century progress.—G. B. VAN ARSDALL.

Shelbyville, Ill., Dec. 27.—Just closed our meeting with 33 additions. Prof. Hutto, of Manhattan, Kan., led the singing the first two weeks, but took sick and N. J. Wright, of Olney, Ill., was called to the rescue and did us splendid work, besides being a preacher of no mean ability.—WM. DRUMMET, pastor.

Decatur, Ill., Dec. 31.—We had a fine day yesterday at the Tabernacle. Three additions by letter, two by confession and three others were baptized who made the confession on the previous Lord's day. I preached to a thousand people last night. Our present membership is 777. Have had 20 additions here since I began the work three months ago.—J. C. COGGINS.

Augusta, Ill., Jan. 3.—One confession at our preaching service last Sunday evening. Work on our church about finished, and we are waiting for the new pews. Since last spring our "Mite Society" has taken in $180 and bought the new carpet for the church, and is aiding on our new church light. Our young brother, Amos Hoffer, who is studying for the ministry, has just left us for Eureka.—A. L. FERGUSON.

Cameron, Ill., Jan. 3.—One addition last night at prayer-meeting. The best prayer-meeting since my coming here. C. H. White, pastor at Galesburg, begins a meeting for Bro. Spencer at Coldbrook next Monday night.—O. D. MAPLE.

Ladoga, Ind., Jan. 1.—Bro. J. B. Briney closed lately a two weeks' meeting for us, which was one of the best in our history. An impression was made upon our community by his grand sermons. I want to heartily commend his stereopticon lectures as works of the highest order.—W. T. BROOKS.

New Sharon, Ia., Dec. 27.—Two weeks' meeting recently closed; three converts. Guy H. Wingate, of Montezuma, preached. I go to assist pastor at Montezuma Jan. 1.—H. JAS. CROCKETT.

Estherville, Iowa.—H. Morton Gregory has been called to the church here for another year. Ninety additions the past year.

Des Moines, Iowa.—On the last Sunday of the century 11 good people confessed the Lord and were baptized. The Lord is wonderfully blessing us here. Three other accessions not reported, making 42 in the last few weeks. I never saw a more devoted and larger-hearted people.—E. W. BRICKERT, pastor East Side Church of Christ.

Mason City, Iowa, Jan. 3.—W. E. Harlow began a meeting at Mason City, Ia., the evening of New Year's day. This is Bro. Harlow's third meeting with this church and it is hoped that he will be as successful the third time as the other two meetings were.—R. C. SARGENT.

Mt. Ayr, Iowa.—J. M. Lowe, of Des Moines, Iowa, has begun a meeting with the church here. Evangelistic services are also in progress at the Methodist Church.

Moulton, Ia., Jan. 4.—B. F. Hill, of California, Mo., was with us three weeks in a meeting. Thirteen accessions during the time and three the following Sunday. My father, D. R. Dungan, spent the holidays here and preached for us Saturday and Sunday.—R. M. DUNGAN.

Atchison, Kan.—Annual report of the First Church: Sermons, 140 (43 of these at the Soldiers Orphans' Home); additions, by confession and baptism, 18; by letter, 25; dismissals, 25; net gain, 18. No protracted meeting during the year. In all departments $2,600 were raised, of which $500 were paid on the mortgage debt and $125 for missions. The pastor officiated at 29 funerals and 32 weddings. We need a larger church building, one seating 1,000 or 1,200 people. We have the largest audiences, Bible-school, C. E., etc., in town. For the new year we hope to see a deeper spiritual life in the church, more members added and the debt on the church paid and more money given for missions.—WALTER SCOTT PRIEST.

Huron, Kan., Jan. 2.—Our meeting at Peabody closed with nine additions, and church induced to secure Bro. Marion Ingals, one of our present state evangelists, as pastor for all time. We began here at Huron, December 28, with good audiences so far. Church buildings have been locked for years, one torn down. Infidels from Kansas City called here for paid lectures. Bro. Love sends us to break up this; expect a siege.—MILO G. CUMMINGS & WILEY, evangelists.

Yates Center, Kan., Jan. 4.—Commenced a meeting here last Sunday; audiences fine for the first week; two confessions so far, and the assurance of more soon. The members are in earnest and we are hoping for a good meeting.—W. T. ADAMS.

Dodge City, Kan., Jan. 1.—Closed one week's meeting Dec. 30 at Liberal, Kan., my former pastorate; seven by primary obedience;

Antioch, Mo.—I have just closed my third year's work at Antioch, Monroe county, Mo. This is my home church. Here I made the good confession in 1883; here I held my first meeting, and here in February, 1898, I began my first regular work. This church has been served by some of the best men in the state. It is now in a growing condition. They have a membership of about 200. During my ministry with them I baptized 39 persons. The first year they gave $8 for missionary purposes; last year $38. They need a good, live, consecrated pastor. I am now attending the State University and preaching for churches in the vicinity of Columbia.—J. G. CREASON, Columbia, Mo.

Bigelow, Mo., Jan. 13.—The church at this place last September employed W. R. Gill, formerly evangelist of the ninth Kansas district, for one-half time, and the Summit the other one-half time. Arapahoe, Neb., Dec. 25.—Two more confessions and baptisms since last report.—E. G. MERRILL.

Omaha, Neb., Jan. 1.—Two confessions last Sunday at the First Church, making exactly 100 additions since the beginning of my pastorate, April 1. Our annual report shows cheering growth in this difficult field. Ladies' Aid Society raised $450.67 during the year; C. W. B. M. has added 25 members and now numbers 75, and raised $105.75. Junior C. E. has 35 members. Endeavor Society has increased from 32 to 75 during the year. Bible-school averaged 126 for the year; this is same as last year; it will be better next. It raised $250.69, including generous missionary offerings. The church has 402 resident and 233 non-resident members. Net gain of 61 during the past year. Raised for all purposes $3,268.91, of which $458.45 was for missions, and indebtedness reduced by $1,400. The North Side Church, under W. T. Hilton, is prospering. Nearly 100 additions during the year, improvements made on their building, part of debt canceled and pastor's salary increased for next year. South Omaha Church, Howard Cramblett, pastor, grows apace. He has been there four years. I held a meeting there lately with 20 additions, most of them on Sunday when I was not there. If we could have the help of the thousands of former Disciples in this city not in any of our churches, we could have a dozen strong churches.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

Perry, Ohio, Jan. 1.—With home forces we closed the year and century with a five days' meeting at which seven persons made the good confession. Held a prayer, preaching and baptismal service and closed with a watch meeting last night and had a glorious season of spiritual refreshing. The church is prosperous in all departments.—O. A. RICHARDS.

Only those remedial agents which are calculated to aid or assist nature are worthy of attention on the part of the enlightened women of to-day. Many women are suffering day in and day out because they know that many of the remedies and remedial agents thwart rather than aid, hence the benefit gained is but temporary, and even then often at the expense of some other than the affected part. When to Criticise.

When your heart is warm with love
Even for your enemies;
When your words come from above,
Not from where the venom is;
When you see the man entire,
Not alone the faults he has,
Find a somewhat to admire
Underneath the paltry mass,—
Not till then, if you are wise,
Will you dare to criticise.

When you see the thing that's wrong,
And—a way to better it,—
Push a noble cause along,
Not with censure fetter it;
When your purpose is to build,
Not to tear the building down,
Use the sunshine that will gild,
Not the dark and dismal frown,—
Not till then, if you are wise,
Will you dare to criticise.

Struggling Toward the Light.

By Walter S. Smith.

Chapter XI.—Settled and at Work.

The people at Luzon were glad to get the services of Brother Portly, and they even offered to aid the Freedom congregation. But this gallant body had been too well taught to need aid. There were but sixty-nine members, fully twenty of them very poor and none of them wealthy; but they averaged nearly ten dollars apiece. Such a spirit will triumph anywhere and so there might be employment for all the preachers and preaching for all the churches, and mission money too.

The pulse of the old church was greatly improved and its temperature became normal. Timothy had learned much from the Baptists in the way of business order and he went at once to work upon the restoration of congregational activity. There were regular officers' meetings for counsel and direction, and committee work was arranged so as to give all the members something to do. The Sunday-school doubled in attendance; the singing improved, and the prayer-meeting began to develop the talent for edification. As a healthful result the room began to be full on preaching occasions and the accessions that should have been reached by the four weeks' protracted meeting came in at the regular Sunday services.

Brother Smith, the member five miles away, lived in a small village south-east of Freedom. One day when the preacher was at his house, he proposed a little preaching at the school-house. This suited Timothy. Repairing at once to the school-house, he announced preaching for that night. At the appointed hour the house was full. Ruby was an organist and the music of the evening was inspiring.

Timothy spoke on Talent, from Paul's outline on that subject, suggesting that nobody could tell what the pupils of Lynnville might make of themselves. Surely the talents they possessed would be made fruitful by dedicating them to Christ. The teacher liked the lesson so well that he pressed Bro. Henry to preach again the next night.

Not to be too circumstantial, the preaching ran into a meeting and thirty or more confessed Christ and were baptized. The first of these was the teacher himself, and he at once became a Sunday-school superintendent. A branch congregation was organized and in less than a year they built and dedicated a meeting house. Thus the flames of Timothy's torch were imparted to other torches and Freedom became a sort of Jerusalem. The tone was improved there too. Prof. Short became ashamed of his base wire-pulling and said many kind things about the thriving church. It was no longer a "Campbellite side-show," but the most potent influence in town toward civilizing the young. They behaved so much better in school than before that he and all the teachers noted it. They even encouraged the pupils to go and hear that preacher.

When the Lynnville meeting closed, in the middle of May, Timothy received by mail an invitation to visit the Bend. "We have been repairing the meeting-house," said the letter, "and we want some sort of ceremony at the time of its re-opening. Our minister would like for you to be present. There is a condition of things here that will surprise and please you. Brother Norris says it is the effect of a little leaven working in some of the best meal ever seen in Kentucky, and you know Kentucky is famous for meal. I will not explain further except to say it will be done on the second Lord's day in June; and we want you to burn up for us a certain paper. Prepare yourself for a sermon on Saturday night, when we will allow you all the latitude you want on the subject of Christian Loyalty. The man who will do the preaching on Sunday morning is a preacher of the Christian Church. His name is Matthews, or something like that. There! I have told more than I intended, and as we cannot work the surprise we intended upon you, I will say we have all become Christians. We are ashamed of the narrowness of the past. From the day I said Job Norris was not a good Baptist, I have been thinking about it and after Prof. Guthrie's departure the preacher who came in his place made me doubly ashamed by his first sermon. He said a man who will stay out of church because he does not like the preacher is not a good Christian. Our standard should be Christ and nothing lower. I made him go home with me to dinner and I told him his remark reminded me of one I made about Norris, which I quoted to him. He asked me if Norris was a good Christian. I had to stammer, 'Yes, he is without guile.' Then he said, 'To be a good Christian is higher than being a good Baptist, and you all turned out your betters.' I then asked, 'Why, then, should there be a Baptist Church at all? Why not call it the Church of Christ?' He sat a while silent and then said, 'It would be the highest possible act of loyalty.' My mind went like a flash back to Job Norris' language: 'I cannot be disloyal to the Holy Spirit for the sake of loyalty to the Baptist Church;' and I told the preacher of it. Again he was silent a moment and then answered: 'Brother Norris was right and the committee was wrong.'

"Well, lest I weary you, the subject was much thought over until the next church meeting and there it was brought up by the preacher. We were all astonished to find each other of one mind and they said it was the leaven of Brother Guthrie's sermons. I am ashamed of the manner in which I treated that manly teacher. The ten-dollar note you find enclosed please hand to him and tell him to forgive me. It is the unpaid balance of my school bill.

"At a certain point in our deliberations Squire Lee, who was our moderator, proposed that we appoint a committee to report a resolution, and all agreed. The preacher and I were appointed and we soon had the following ready to report:

"'Resolved, That the congregation at the Bend, hitherto known as the Missionary Baptist Church, discard that title and adopt in its stead the title, Church of Christ.

"'Resolved, That we burn our old code of doctrines and adopt in its stead the New Testament.

"'Resolved, That we rescind the action of last October, withdrawing fellowship from Job Norris, and declare him our brother in full fellowship and worthy of all confidence.'

"These resolutions were unanimously adopted and we all felt so happy we just got up and began to shake hands. So now, Brother Henry, you see what it is we want you to burn. Brother Lee joins me in regards and we confidently expect you to come. If Brother Guthrie can come also, tell him to do so.

"I am your brother, indeed,
"JOSEPH REVELL.

"P. S. We will pay your expenses and his and remunerate you both."

Make it, as Lincoln made his in the wilderness. Make it, as Henry Wilson made his during his evenings on the farm, when he read a thousand volumes, while other boys of the neighborhood wasted their evenings. Make it, as the shepherd boy Ferguson made his when he calculated the distance of the stars with a handful of beads on a string. Make it, as George Stephenson made his when he mastered the rules of mathematics with a bit of chalk on the sides of the coal wagons in the mines. Make it, as Douglas made it when he learned to read from scraps of paper and posters. Make it, as Napoleon made his in a hundred important situations. Make it, as the deaf and blind Helen Keller is making hers. Make it, as every man must who would accomplish anything worth the effort. How's the World To-day?

Sing of Hindoos, Greeks, Iranians,
Basques, Etruscans, Jews;
Sing of Parthians, Medes—but tell me,
Tell me, what's the news?
Old and rude things, they were good things,
And the old years did their shrewd things
In a wise and shrewd old way;
Yes, but tell me just a few things,
What's the news, and what's the new things?
How's the world to-day?

"How's the world now?" Better, better,
Growing sweet and strong,
Pulsing with a healthier purpose,
Working long and long.
Working new things, strong things, true things,
Reaching forth and far to do things
In a bold and strong new way;
Pausing not to weep and rue things,
Striving hard to do the due things,—
That's the world to-day.

Keep in step there while we're marching
To the new glad tune;
We have reached the clime of blossoms,
And the world's in June.
'Mid these light things and these bright things
Hope and courage are the right things—
Up, and on, and march away!
For the world is in its tune-time,
In the high-tide of its June-time,—
That's the world to-day.

Glad with greatness, strong with power
And the will to do,
Fed with dreams and filled with music,
We make all things new.
Old and rude things, they were good things,
And the old years did their shrewd things
In wise and shrewd old way.
Yes, but tell me just a few things,
What's the news and what's the new things?
How's the world to-day?

The Duties of the Guest.

The duties of the guest have never been overmuch dwelt upon in the ethical code of the home as set forth by writers and other experienced persons. The duties of the host and hostess have received full share of attention, but the guest is supposed to know how to play the part of the guest without any coaching. It is, however, the testimony of the large class of hostesses that very few persons know how to be popular and desirable guests.

One hostess complains that guests sometimes make her twice glad; that is, glad when they come, and glad again when they go. "When I invite a woman to visit me," she said, "I specify as to the time. In four cases out of five she comes three days too late and stays several days too long. I, having other plans, am therefore incommoded to some extent; not seriously, perhaps, but my plans, at least, are taken out of my hands and rearranged for me. It annoys me."

Another hostess confides that her guests are often late to breakfast and to dinner, and this tardiness, she says, upsets the routine of the housework, and makes her servants grow dissatisfied. Still another hostess asserts that her guests are very untidy as to their effects in their room. Her entire house is always in perfect order except when she has company, when the room they occupy is in chaos. It is also further claimed that guests do not always regard the time and the privacy of the hostess, and labor under the impression that just because they are visitors the hostess belongs to them.

It is evident from all this testimony that the guest does not always know her place or how to return the obligation to the hostess. The obligation is not to be returned by a visit always, for many housekeepers are not free to leave home to return a visit. It is frequently the case that the home woman gains her recreation through the guest she invites to come to her. The latter being the case, how essential that the guest should study the points of her own attitude towards the hostess. It is the height of art to conceal art. Just as the hostess conceals the art of entertaining, so the guest may conceal the art of being easily entertained.

In the ethical code governing the behavior of the guest many points are contained.

You may arrive a few days later than the invitation specifies, but you should not remain overtime. Even if you are coaxed to prolong your stay, a ready tact should make it clear that your presence is required at home or elsewhere. The guest who is regretted and missed is the popular guest. The guest at whose departure everyone draws a sigh of relief is the one who has made her hosts twice glad.

It is also a part of the ethical code that you should be on time at meals, not a minute late at one of them. No guest has a right to disregard the domestic schedule of events. Keep your things "picked up" and put in their proper places, and your room looking as well as your hostess usually keeps it. Put the pillow-shams on the bed, and do not stick pins in the best satin pincushion. Use your own comb and brush, and when you leave do not carry away the silver manicure-file nor the scissors by mistake, as some guests have a way of doing. Have your laundry-work done outside if possible; if not permitted to do so, do not fail to remunerate the servants generously for the service.

The guest should take herself away on some pretext at certain hours each day; ostensibly to rest herself, but really to give her hostess an opportunity to rest or have time to herself. She can popularize herself with the children by telling them a story or showing them pictures. She should never point out the children's faults to the parents, or even notice that they have any faults. She should refrain from being present at any little family disputes, and she cannot be at fault in saying too little and listening well.

The presenting of gifts depends largely upon circumstances. If the guest is able financially to present gifts on arrival, gifts at that time seem to have an added value. She should remember the servants on her departure, and when she arrives home she can recall her pleasant visit later when the holiday season arrives.

There are a thousand things that a guest can do to make her hostess glad she invited her to come. She can be pleased with friends of her hostess and their entertainments. She can show appreciation of her church and the minister and her clubs. For it is the duty of the guest to make the hostess happy quite as much as it is the duty of the host to make the guest enjoy herself.—Harvot Holt Cahoon in Woman's Home Companion.

Bogus Antiquities.

The passion for collecting antiques is widespread, and the number of old curiosity shops increases rapidly. The people who buy in order to be in the fashion are the best customers; that is, they are the most ignorant, and therefore the most readily deceived. In some of the shops it would be difficult to find a single article which is what it purports to be. The ingenuity of the forger is unlimited. Furniture, prints, china, pictures, plate, armor, ivory, bronze, tapestry—all are successfully imitated.

Many imitations of antiques are clumsy enough, but some deceive even the initiated. The experts of national museums have more than once been imposed upon. The British Museum bought a Palissy plate for two hundred and fifty dollars. Whilst an attendant was handling it, one of the seals attached to its back—attesting its genuineness—became detached, disclosing the mark of a modern French potter. The terra-cotta figures of Isis and Osiris, bought by the same institution for five thousand dollars, have been discovered to be composed of modern clay.

The specialty of one forger is old leather jacks at two dollars and a half each; of another horn-books at a dollar and a quarter. The prices vary, but it may be set down as a rule that they include about a thousand per cent. of profit.

A writer in Chambers' Journal not long since inspected a specimen of a "mummy servant"—an effigy, in a plastic material, such as the Egyptians buried with their dead. Close examination proved it to be made of putty. It was a clever forgery.

Count Michael Tyskiewiez, a noted collector and judge of antiquities, gives some interesting details of the forgeries that have been attempted from the earliest times. No metal lent itself so early to this work as gold. Etruscan jewelry has been largely manufactured in Italy, but Syria has carried on the most extensive forgery of gold works of art. Forgeries in silver have been less successful.

The count tells an amusing story of a great silver cup in Rome that purported to have come from some secret excavation in Sicily. This "ancient" cup was ornamented with a circular bas-relief representing, of all things, the frieze of the Parthenon. In the height of his innocence, the forger had given the frieze in its present ruined condition. The cup obtained an immediate success—shouts of laughter.

The Career of an Island.

Islands are formed in several ways, and if large are generally looked upon as fairly permanent features of the earth's surface; but occasionally they disappear, and we are surprised at the history their destruction reveals. One such island, upon which I played when a boy, had no appearance of being otherwise than a part of the mainland around which the water had worked its way; but the truth was revealed when the soil was removed and the core of the island proved to be a stranded tree. It was clear that a long time ago some great freshet had uprooted and carried downstream a large tree, and that it had lodged at some shallow spot. No sooner was it an obstruction to the free flowing of the water than it began catching drifting material, and this securely lodged was an additional check to the progress of anything floating. Such a barrier soon begins to collect sand about it, and the growth of an island is then begun. In the sand lodge seeds of water-plants, and these rank growths, if submerged species, check the current and cause floating particles to sink; and later, taller plants, like wild rice, spatter-dock, and arrow-head, take root and flourish. Thus, by various modes, the soil is accumulated, or, as I said, the island grows. Then the seed of some tree lodges, and a maple, a willow, or a water-birch takes root. Dry land is made at last; grass starts, and the birds frequent the spot. It may be the work of a few years or many, or of centuries, but this is the history of some of the islands in our rivers and creeks. Perhaps we never think of this when walking about, and that is where we make a grave mistake. No matter what the character of the locality, it is always well to look up its geological history, that we can the better understand its present condition. The island of which I have told gave no clue as to why it was an island and not a bit of the surrounding meadow; but this is not reason for wondering why it was here at all. Nowhere is the world just as it has always been.

That my play-day island, now no more, was very old, as we count years, was shown by the fact that close to the level of the water were found pretty flint arrow-heads and pieces of Indian pottery. Here was a pretty chapter of the island's history. When but a sand-bar, bare perhaps at low tide only, Indians came here, perhaps to fish, or to lie in wait for passing water-fowl; but here they came, and what they left behind them clearly proves that the old tree was the foundation of the new island long before the white man came to this country.

Wherever there is a little brook, the story of the making and unmaking of islands is told. On a small scale, everywhere, the great works of creation are being repeated. It is never necessary to travel to the ends of the earth to learn about a great many interesting things that are going on out of doors. The familiar incidents about our door-steps are never to be despised. A cat in the grass can tell as much as a tiger in a jungle.—Charles C. Abbott, M. D., in St. Nicholas.

Queens' Husbands.

Being husband to a queen is a serious matter, not lightly to be entered upon, and not so common as one would think at first. Of course there is a reasonably large number of royal women who have husbands who are kings, but that is a very different thing from being the husband of a woman who is a queen in her own right. The recent betrothal of the girl Queen of Holland, Wilhelmina, recalls how few such marriages there have been during the century just past.

It is, in fact, over fifty years since a European reigning queen has taken a husband. The last queen to do so was Isabella of Spain, who on the tenth of October, 1846, married her cousin, Don Francisco d'Assissi. The queen was only sixteen years old at the time. Don Francisco received the title of King Consort. The marriage was never a happy one; and innumerable scandals, intrigues and jealousies followed it.

Of course the marriage of Queen Victoria occurs to every one, at once, as the most notable example of a semi-royal union in the history of modern times. Her husband was Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, to whom she was married Feb. 10, 1840. He never was to take the title of King Consort, and had to content himself with being known as Prince Consort. There have occasionally been rumors that Queen Victoria was a jealous wife, but these do not seem to be very well authenticated, and it is much more probable that this was an exceptionally happy royal marriage. Certainly the widowed queen's devotion to her husband's memory and her success as a mother in bringing up her family of children since his death have been conspicuous.

Some other English queens have had interesting histories in the way of husbands. Princess Mary of York married William of Orange. Later, when she became queen he was crowned with her as king. This double coronation necessitated the making of a second coronation chair, so that the two sovereigns could receive the royal honors together. The original English coronation chair is over six hundred years old, and every English sovereign who has ascended the throne during all that time has sat in this chair which is kept in Westminister Abbey, where Queen Victoria sat in it for a second time at the great celebration which commemorated her fiftieth anniversary. The second chair, made for William of Orange, stands beside it. People who look at the two chairs closely see that the seat of the new one is about four inches the higher. Thereby is revealed a queer bit of royal pride. Queen Mary was a large woman nearly six feet tall. Her husband was a rather small man, and not her equal in height. That he might not look insignificant beside her at the coronation ceremony his chair was made enough higher than hers so that his head was brought up to the level where hers was.

After King William died—his wife having died some years before he did—the Princess Anne became queen. She is usually known in history as "Good Queen Anne." This descriptive epithet may have been gained because she did not do anything of very much account, either good or bad. One printed opinion of her and her husband says: "Queen Anne came to the throne bringing with her as husband Prince George of Denmark, a fat-headed person of no importance. He never received any title as husband of the queen, not even that of Prince Consort. Without injustice it may be said of this royal pair,

> 'They both are well mated for life,
> For she's got a fool for a husband,
> And he's got a fool for a wife.'"

That Mary, Queen of England, who is generally known in history as "Bloody Mary" is one of the few who married a distinctly royal husband, and the marriage was most unhappy. Her husband was Philip II, King of Spain, Naples and Sicily. The jealousies which followed this marriage were endless and bitter, and they were not only personal but national. The queen was furiously jealous—and apparently with reason—of her royal husband's fondness for other women. The English people were intensely opposed to any possibility of having him become their ruler, and the people of Spain were no less unfriendly towards their sovereign's English wife. Few queens have crowded more sorrow into so short a period than did this one into her short reign.

That other unhappy royal Mary—Mary, Queen of Scots,—was one of the most married of royal women. When she was so young that she was known as "the little Queen of Scotland," she was married to the Dauphin of France, who was afterwards for a few months king of that country. After he had died and she had been a widow for five years she married her cousin, Henry Stuart, whose title was that of Lord Darnley. He died a most tragic death, and the queen afterwards married another Scotch noble, James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell. They had been married only a month when her subjects revolted, made her a prisoner, and compelled her to abdicate the throne. She was a prisoner for many years after that, and was finally beheaded. In spite of all her troubles and disgraces, her son became the first king of united England and Scotland, and the founder of a long line of sovereigns.

It is to be hoped Queen Wilhelmina's marriage will be a happier one than the most of these which have been recalled. It seems to be as true a "love match" as any in the most plebeian circles. Prince Henry of Mechlenburg-Schwerin comes of what is the only reigning family in western Europe which is of Slavonic origin. It is one of the oldest, if not the very oldest royal house in Germany. Oddly enough neither he nor the queen are related to Queen Victoria, although there are few of the royal personages in Europe now who are not.

The Queen of Holland saw her future husband for the first time less than a year before they became engaged. She met him in Berlin. It was a "love at first sight" affair. There had been arranged by some of the Queen's friends and would-be advisers, a grand dinner to which there were invited a number of eligible young semi-royal men from whom it was hoped that she might select a husband. After the Queen met Prince Henry she would have no more of the scheme. She refused to go to the dinner, pleaded that she had a cold, and stayed at home. The royal candidates got no further with their suits. The Queen's mother, seeing how the wind was blowing, cut the visit to Berlin short and took her royal daughter off home to Holland, and like a prudent mother began to make inquiries about Prince Henry. As all these inquiries resulted favorably, the Queen mother allowed arrangements to be made by which a better acquaintance was possible. She planned to take her daughter to spend a month or so in the Schwartzburg, in a castle there, within the domains of the Prince, and the Dowager Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, the Duke's mother, was invited to be her guest.

The plan worked beautifully. The Prince got a furlough from the army and came to see his mother. Then he prolonged his stay and devoted his time to acting as guide for the two Queens to many of the picturesque and beautiful places in the Principality. It is reported that when the party broke up the young Queen said to him: "What a happy tour! I never spent such a happy time in my life, and I feel I owe so much to you." Correspondence and the natural result followed, and eventually the Queen summoned her prime minister to the Palace of Loo, to tell him that she had selected a husband for herself. Everybody is pleased, and wishes them all possible happiness.—Comfort.

He Spoke to the Court.

"An old darky's ceremonious politeness broke up the dignity of an Eastern Shore Court in my younger days," said Mr. Alonzo L. Miles, counsel to the Board of Police Commissioners, according to the Baltimore Sun.

"Judge Goldsboro was on the bench at the time, and one of the lawyers engaged in the case was the late John W. Crisfield, for many years one of the leaders of the Maryland bar. The old negro—one of the picturesque and exceedingly polite antebellum darkies—was giving his testimony, and while talking turned his back on the Judge and addressed himself to Mr. Crisfield. The latter noticed it, and in a quick and rather peremptory way interrupted the old negro and said:

"'Speak to the court, Tom, speak to the court.'

"Turning around, old Tom made a low, courtly bow to Judge Goldsboro, and said, in his politest tones:

"'Good-mawnin', court.'

"Then he turned his back to the bench again, satisfied that he had done the proper thing in the proper manner, while the court and spectators roared. Judge Goldsboro delighted to tell the story to the day of his death."

Americans in Knee-Breeches.

Honorable John W. Foster, former Secretary of State and one of the most widely experienced of American diplomats, tells in this week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post interesting and amusing instances of American Diplomats and Court Costumes. The ladies will be interested in knowing that in diplomacy extreme consideration is given to the kind of clothes which the representatives wear. In the course of this article Mr. Foster says:

"Some Ministers have made themselves ridiculous by securing an appointment in the state militia, and making use of that uniform. A story is told of one of our representatives at a European Court who appeared at the palace in the garb of a captain of a cavalry troop, a post he had filled at home, which led the monarchical diplomats, attracted by his metal helmet, quizzically to ask if he belonged to a fire company in America! The instructions of the Department of State now in force construe the law to allow of such a departure from a simple dress as will secure our diplomats welcome admittance at court ceremonies.

"For instance, the members of the United States Embassy in London appear on state occasions in knee-breeches, with metal buckles on their shoes, and in other respects in ordinary evening dress."

PETE.

VIII.—Close Quarters.

Edgar peeped cautiously between the leaves of the grapevines. Sure enough, Mr. Pendleton was just disappearing around the corner of his own house with his own pretty yellow ladder. "Pete," said Edgar seriously, "you've gotten me into trouble, and yourself as well. What will your mother think of me when she learns that I let you out of captivity? You will have to tell her that you deceived me and then it will be worse for you. At the same time she will blame me for getting you into trouble. That's the way with mothers."

"Yes, that's so," said Pete, eating her tomato with undiminished zest. "Once I slipped up behind Tommy Greeger and shoved him over into the loveliest snowbank that was right there at the edge of the sidewalk, a-tempting me to do it. Well, mamma happened to be coming along behind and saw the whole thing, and she knew Tommy hadn't been doing a thing to me. So she had to punish me (mamma never whips, she starves). But the funny thing is that she has never liked Tommy Greeger since that day! I'm sorry I got you into this scrape, and it won't do for mamma to know about your part. So we must get that ladder back, somehow."

Edgar brightened, "Of course! Come on, then, and let's try for it!"

"Just you wait," retorted Pete. "I didn't climb down just to climb up, like white mice. They's lots of time and I know where we'll find the ladder. Mr. Pendleton wants to shingle a place on his barn, I heard him say so. You eat a cucumber and don't look so unhappy, but le's talk. Why, I've been in lots and piles of scrapes before, and I've learned to enjoy um while they're going on. Time enough to bother about um when you're spending the day locked up in your bedroom. Now have you got rid of that tramp like you said you was going to?"

"I had a talk with him," said Edgar, resignedly peeling his cucumber, "but I couldn't scare him off. He said if I had him arrested he would tell your mother's secret to everybody that came along. I don't know what that secret is, so I am afraid to drive him to extremity."

"Yes, don't," cried Pete. "Mamma wouldn't have it told for the world. I don't know what it is, either, but mamma said it wasn't anything that ever she had done. But, oh Mr. Brown, you won't ever breathe that to a living soul, will you?"

"Never! You can trust me, Pete."

"That's the way I feel, Mr. Brown. A man that will take up a stray dog for a little girl and just go tagging around with it like he wasn't caring for anything but just dogs, why, I think he's pretty safe. At least he's different from other men. I wonder what makes you so different? And why do you want to be with little children? And why don't you sit with men your size and smoke with them and talk politics and be in your shirt-sleeves?"

"I don't know," said Edgar, with a smile. "I don't seem to care for grown-up people, somehow."

"Was you ever married, Mr. Brown?"

"No, I never was," he said, with a start. Then he gave a curious laugh and said, "Not but what I would have been, if I had had my way!"

"Oh, oh!" cried Pete. "Was she a blonde or a brunette?"

"Blonde; golden hair; peach complexion; rosy."

"So she had her way, did she? And that wasn't your way? I've always thought it sad that when a man loves you, you can't always love him. I've thought a good deal on marriage," said Pete. "Tell us about your blonde."

"It was two years ago, Pete, and she went everywhere with me—"

"Circuses?"

"N-no. Lectures and musicales—"

"I think you must have loved her! I think lectures are so dry, don't you? And musicales—oh, dear me! And did she give you a rose?"

"Yes, Pete; and her pictures—five of them. You see she made me think—or let me think—"

"Did you ever kiss her?" inquired Pete, in an awed voice. Edgar blushed handsomely and said, "Pete, suppose you take your tomatoes and things up to your room and eat them there. I feel very uneasy."

"Well, I will on your account. Wait till I gather a whole lot of grapes and other things. And you can walk along behind me and talk to me while I am at work."

"But do you think you can eat all that, Pete?"

"I never have found out yet how much I can eat. I am going to see this evening. Mr. Brown, I believe Madge would like you. The trouble is to get her started with you."

"I am just going to come," said Edgar, "and ask to see her and talk to her and make her get acquainted with me. I'd have no trouble with Linda May if it wasn't for that—I mean her aunt."

"Yes, I know what you mean. Now I guess I have enough supper" (her apron was so heavy she could hardly hold it together). She carried her spoils under her bedroom window. "Now for the ladder," she said. "Follow me. But wait, I'll see if they're coming." She mounted a gatepost and looked up the road. "No, I knew it wasn't time for um. Come on." She leaped from the post and climbed Mr. Patterson's side fence. Edgar felt some delicacy in making the invasion, but his situation was desperate. He followed Pete around back of the house, leading his dog, and looking so guilty that he actually had a skulking appearance. There was the barn, and against the roof stood the yellow ladder. The sound of hammering was in the air. Hurrah! Mr. Pendleton was at work on the farther side of the top-ridge, so he could not see them. Edgar seized the ladder while Pete danced back to her own yard. Edgar had nearly reached the fence when he heard a voice from the roof of the barn. "Hi! Bring back my ladder, will you?" Edgar turned and saw Mr. Pendleton glaring over the ridge of the roof.

"Hurry up," cried Pete, who stood in the apple tree. "They're coming! I see them coming out of Miss Dollie's!" Edgar hastened toward the fence. "Will you bring back my ladder?" roared Mr. Pendleton. "Who are you anyway? I want to come down for some more nails. Here, young man, do you think that's your ladder?"

"Plenty of time, if you hurry," cried Pete sliding out of the tree with no more thought of her legs than if they'd been glass vases filled with flowers and set on the table to look at. "Miss Dollie's house is 'way off but it's on a hill so I can see it good from the tree, and I saw all of 'em come out the front door; mamma and Jennie and Madge and Miss Dollie and Linda May. Oh, hurry, hurry, hurry!"

"You scamp!" shouted Mr. Pendleton. "Are you going to bring back my ladder?"

"No, I'm not," cried Edgar becoming desperate as he reached the side fence. "I've got to have it, so now!" He looked quite defiant. But Lucifer's disposition brought trouble. Lucifer, for all he was big and black, was not very brave. Mr. Pendleton's angry voice had unnerved him, and in his haste to get out of the yard he had tangled his cord in the palings. He got himself so wrapped up that he could not move leg or paw. Whenever Mr. Pendleton shouted Lucifer would strain at his bonds and yelp just as dogs yelp when you hit them with a stone. Edgar was obliged to leave his friend in this painful condition while he rushed with the ladder to the window. Pete began to climb it almost before it was set upon the ground. "You bring up my vegetables," she panted.

"I'm afraid they'll come!" panted Edgar.

"You thief! You impudent rascal!" roared Mr. Pendleton, who could not see them now, as his house stood in the way. Lucifer, who thought himself addressed, gave a frantic "Yap! How—oo!" and liberated himself by tearing a paling off of the side fence, which he brought dangling behind him as he bounded into Mrs. Morris' yard.

According to John, the only evangelist that tells the story of this lesson, it seems to have taken place on the day of Jesus' triumphant entry into the city, on Palm Sunday, April 2nd. It is possible, however, that it was a day or two later, on one of his regular visits to the city. The Master was probably in the Women's Court of the temple, in which no Gentile was permitted to enter. The city and its environs were crowded with pilgrims, from all parts of the world, come up to the Passover feast. These would seek the sacred precincts of the temple daily, to join in the worship that went on almost without ceasing. Among the visitors that day were certain Greeks, worshipers of the true God, of whom they had doubtless learned from Jewish neighbors, and who had come to Jerusalem to attend the Passover. The very air was vocal with the fame of Jesus' acts and words, and the story of his recent entry as a king was on every tongue. These Gentiles desired to see this great one, whom many believed to be the Messiah for whose coming the world had so long waited. But they could not go into the temple enclosure, which was sacred to Jews alone. They applied to Philip, therefore, whose Greek name seems to indicate that he was the child of one Greek parent, or that his family was at least free from the prejudice which would forbid giving a child any other than a Hebrew name. "Sir, we would see Jesus," was the simple, earnest request of these devout men. Was it curiosity, or a deeper motive that moved them to this request? Evidently the latter, if we may judge from the response of the Master, who saw in this seeking of a few honest Gentile souls the beginning of that great turning of the world to him, through which he should be forever glorified.

It may seem strange to us that Philip did not at once carry their request to Jesus, and bring them into his blessed presence. But he seems to have been doubtful whether the Savior would wish an interview with uncircumcised strangers. So he goes to tell Andrew, and they both together seek Jesus and convey to him the desire of the Greeks. It was not the first time, nor the last either, that Jesus was misunderstood by his disciples, as to his gracious purpose to redeem all men, of every race and tongue. Indeed, we are only now coming to realize the obligation of the followers of Christ to help the world to see Jesus in the beauty of his character, the fullness of his grace and the richness of his promises. The sin-sick world, like the restless babe, tossing in its mother's arms, may not know what are its real needs and may cry out for everything else than Christ; but he knows that the world's hope is in him alone, and we know it too and ought to preach him with such fidelity and follow him with such loving loyalty, that in beholding our Christian lives, men shall indeed "see Jesus."

To the surprise of the two disciples, the Master at once turned to go with them to where the Greeks were waiting and said, as they walked beside him, his face turned toward the heavens with a look of ecstasy in strange contrast with the sadness that had been daily gathering there, "The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified." Not, however, in the way men seek glory, but rather after the fashion in which God has ever glorified his own works. "Except a grain of wheat fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone; but if it die, it beareth much fruit. He that loveth his life loseth it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." Life must be sacrificed that it may multiply itself. To withhold the seed is to lose the harvest. Mother love perils life itself to bring new lives into the world, and devotes the remainder of her own to build up the lives of her children. The patriot "loves not his life unto the death," but yields it in arduous service or willing sacrifice for his country. The martyr "counts not his life dear unto himself, if only he may finish his course with joy, and fulfill the ministry that he has received from the Lord Jesus." The immortals of human history are those who gave life lavishly for others. The contempt of human kind is reserved for those who have used life as a means of selfish gratification. He who would follow Jesus must imitate him in his life of self-abnegation; and he shall share in the glory that awaits the friends of the heavenly Bridegroom.

It is probable that most of these things Jesus had spoken in the presence of the Greeks who had asked for him. He wanted them to know that the way of holiness and glory lay in the path of humble service. And now the shadow of the cross for a moment fell darkly upon his soul. But a few days, and "his hour" would have come. Already he felt the chill of the world's rejection and tasted the agony of the cross. He could not repress his emotions. The disciples heard him say, in subdued but intense tones, "Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Shall it be, Father, save me from this hour? But for this purpose came I unto this hour, that I might be the world's redeemer. I will not draw back from my mission. My prayer shall be, Father, glorify thy name!" This, freely rendered, was the force of his words. It was a foretaste of Gethsemane, where his petition was "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." What sublime submission is this, and how it puts to shame our selfish petitions. When we can make the heart of every prayer the longing request that God will glorify his name through us, whether by life or death, we will be ready to prove ourselves the world's helpers toward salvation.

Not till the petition reaches its climax in perfect self-surrender does the answer come. Then it drops from heaven, in words that thrill and terrify the hearers, "I have both glorified it and will glorify it again." Thrice did the voice of God sound from the skies, in testimony to his Beloved Son, and each time when his sacrificial death was being shown forth in word or deed. At his baptism, when he was buried in the symbolic grave of the Jordan, that he might fulfill all righteousness; at his transfiguration, when Moses and Elijah conversed with him about the death which he should die at Jerusalem; and here, when he has just bowed his reverent soul in submission to the Father's will, and accepted the cross as his only earthly throne. Does this not show us the supreme interest of the Father in the death of Jesus as the culmination of the divine effort for the world's salvation? And is it not ever true that the voice of God is heard most plainly by his children when the shadows of death are drawing closest? Stephen saw not the open doors of heaven till his soul was ready to take its flight through them by the short way of martyrdom.

The voice of God is seldom recognized. Many of those who heard it said it had thundered—a strange phenomenon under a clear April sky of Judea. Others, who were near enough to catch an inkling of the words, said an angel had spoken. Only the disciples knew that it was the voice of Jehovah. So has it ever been. God's voice has thundered through human history and a faithless world has heard naught but the noise of nature's machinery. A few have thought that some message might be meant for men, but have faintly deciphered its lessons. Those only who have stood close about the Master have known that every event has had its place in the eternal plan of the heavenly Father, and that through them all he was working out his purpose of grace for the children of men, and that nothing save the obstruction of human blindness and sin delayed its full accomplishment. "This voice came for your sakes," said the Master, "that you might know that God is with me, and that all the forces which oppose my spiritual kingdom are doomed to overthrow. This world shall be judged by its attitude toward me, and the prince of this world, the ruler of the hearts of evil men and angels, shall be cast out into the outer darkness of godless and hopeless misery. When I shall be lifted up on the cross and Satan shall think himself conqueror, then will I begin that mighty conquest which shall cease not till every nation bows to me and all men lift up hands of supplication in my name. What men count defeat I will prove to be victory. The cross, the badge of shame and guilt, I will make forever the symbol of spotless purit and infinite love. Toward him whom Israel shall reject and condemn, and the Gentiles mock and crucify, the race shall turn its weary heart and eager hands for peace and life eternal." Glorious promise! how rapidly it is being fulfilled in these days of the church's victorious progress. Shall we do our part in bringing it to perfect and complete realization?

TOPIC FOR JANUARY 20.

Abiding Influence.

(Heb. 11:4; Matt. 26: 13.)

There are many illustrations to be used of the wideness of influence and of its continuous character. The starting of a wave which widens till it reaches the remotest shore; the sending forth of perfume which premeates, however faintly, the farthest chambers of a house; the escaping of evils from Pandora's box until all the world is reached, and is forever full of them. In these and a score of other ways has the attempt been made to impress upon us the far-reaching and abiding character of influence.

Of the potency of our evil influence we are sufficiently aware. We see almost every day the contagion which our wrong-doing spreads about us. Our ill-humor is catching; our dumps, our blues, our unthoughted words, our materiality of thought, all these and more besides spread themselves out from us in a contagious cloud. And yet we are not, perhaps, aware of the full extent of our evil influence. If our sin concerned ourselves alone, it might not be quite so heinous. But there is no evil under the sun that is confined to a single individual. All evil that we do affects others. The Psalmist was using a hyperbole when he said: "Against thee, thee only have I sinned and done this evil in thy sight." He had sinned against others as well.

But it is of good influence that we all must especially hope to see abiding fruit. Such lives as that of Abel, simple, unpretentious, gentle, unoffensive, but courageous, strong, full of faith, give us courage. And such an act as that of the woman who possessed nothing but a box of ointment which she devoted to the highest possible use, is for us and for all the world and will ever be the odor of a perfumed deed. The lesson of the alabaster box is universal and eternal.

And may it not be that, since truth and righteousness are infinite, while lies and wickedness are limited and finite—may it not be that some day the effects of our sins and wickedness shall be worn out, while our good influence and worthy actions shall, like John Brown's soul, go marching on? This may give us some trifle of comfort as we think of the wrongs we have done. But let this thought never for a moment excuse future thoughtlessness and wickedness in us. Let us never do evil, trusting to time to wipe out its effects.

"Being dead, yet speaketh," is one of the great phrases of literature. It is so pregnant that once heard it never can be forgot. It calls up to one's mind all the lost and loved ones whose beatiful lives remain, like the fragrance of sweet, dead summers, in our hearts. Is there a father, or a mother, a dear, dead sister, a brother, a friend, whose "In memoriam" is singing in our souls, sweet music forever? Of such may it be said, that being dead they yet speak, and that of such is the kingdom.

Here and there is a life which speaks after death to all the world. Here and there some simple deed becomes known to the world and is sung by all the poets, told of by all the orators, till it becomes a household story. But this is only one of a thousand similar actions that are not known. Is it possible that the influence of lowly action is shorter lived than that of the heralded deeds of the same order of worthiness? It is not possible. They shall go marching on. And though they are not told of in French, German, Italian and English, they are translated into the universal heavenly tongue.

> "Count that day lost
> Whose low descending sun
> Views from thy hand
> No worthy action done."

Buffalo, N. Y.

Dog-matic People

Are often capable of doing injury to less positive people, the very emphasis of their affirmation making up for lack of argument and want of evidence. And the worst of all dogmatists are those doctors who, harking back to some old dogma of the schools, insist that certain patients are beyond all medical help, because, forsooth, their diseases are beyond the limited medical knowledge of the dogmatist.

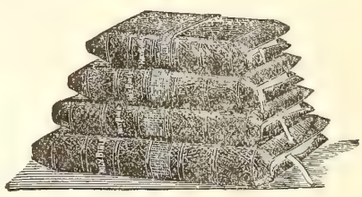
"When the physicians had given me up I was cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery." That statement, varied sometimes in form but identical in fact, is one of the common expressions found in the letters of those cured by "Golden Medical Discovery." Sometimes the statement runs; "I was given up by four doctors," showing a desperate effort to find relief in local practitioners. But however the story begins, it almost invariably ends with the statement, "I am perfectly cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery."

Persons suffering from "weak" lungs, hemorrhages, deep-seated cough, emaciation and weakness, have been restored to perfect health by the "Discovery."

The philosophy of the cures effected by this marvelous medicine is not hard to understand. Life is sustained by food, digested and assimilated. The basis of health is a good appetite and a sound digestion. In almost all cases of disease loss of appetite is an early symptom, and this is promptly followed by a wasting of the flesh. For some cause the food eaten is not being converted into nutrition and the body and its organs, being starved, must grow weak. There is only one way to get strength and that is by food. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery heals diseases of the stomach and allied organs of digestion and nutrition, so enabling the body to assimilate the needed nourishment. Thus various forms of "weakness," so-called, are cured by the "Discovery"—"weak" lungs, "weak" heart, "weak" nerves, "weak" or sluggish liver, etc., because the organs are made strong by food, which is perfectly digested and assimilated after the "Discovery" has healed the diseases of the stomach and associated organs of digestion and nutrition.

PAIN ALL GONE.

"I have taken your medicine with the greatest satisfaction," writes Mrs. George Riehl, of Lockport Station, Westmoreland Co., Penn'a, and can honestly say Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has cured me of a pain in my right lung that the best doctors could not help. My appetite and digestion have improved so that I can eat anything at all, and I feel better than I have for years. Your 'Favorite Prescription' has cured me of womb trouble that I suffered from for fifteen years, and painful monthly troubles. I can work a whole day and not get tired. My pain is all gone and I feel like a new person. I suffered with headache all the time, but have no headache now since taking your medicine. Your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Favorite Prescription' do all that you claim for them, and more, too. I have been cured of troubles that I suffered from for fifteen years, and the best doctor in the State could not cure me. 'Golden Medical Discovery' cured me of neuralgia that I suffered from for five years, and if my letter can save one other poor sufferer, you can publish it."



"ALMOST A MIRACLE."

"I took a severe cold which settled in the bronchial tubes," writes Rev. Frank Hay, of Nortonville, Jefferson Co., Kansas. "After trying medicines labeled "Sure Cure," almost without number, I was led to try Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. I took two bottles and was cured, and have stayed cured.

"When I think of the great pain I had to endure, and the terrible cough I had, it seems almost a miracle that I was so soon relieved."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure constipation. They do not re-act upon the system and become a necessity, as do many other pills.

BUTLER.

Died, at the family residence in Lincoln county, Wash., not far from Griffiths Postoffice, Mrs. Meeker M. Butler, wife of George E. Butler, in her 54th year. Meeker M. Garrett was born Aug. 7, 1847, in Jefferson county, Mo. She became the wife of George E. Butler, the 7th of April, 1865. Sister Butler was the mother of sixteen children, eleven of whom, eight daughters and three sons, with their father, live to mourn her loss. She was a devoted wife, a kind and loving mother, and will be greatly missed by her family. In 1869 she became an obedient believer at Hematite, Mo., and was immersed by Elder Samuel Lee, of Kentucky. To the day of her death, the 29th of November, 1900, her confidence in Him in whom she trusted increased. For some months prior to her departure she was a great sufferer, her doctor believing that a surgical operation was necessary to bring relief. The operation was performed for stone in the bladder. She lived for several weeks after, but never murmured, though her suffering was exceedingly great. The writer held the funeral services with a large audience.

W. R. CUNNINGHAM.

SHALLENBERGER

Elizabeth Boyd Shallenberger departed this life Dec. 11, 1900, aged 72 years and 8 months. A mother in Israel has fallen and we shall miss from her accustomed seat the frail form; we shall miss from the C. W. B. M. auxiliary and the weekly prayer-meeting the voice so often heard in calm, trustful prayer; in the home, where through her long sickness her children so lovingly and tenderly administered to her wants, she will be missed. Her life was full of faith and hope, loyal to the Church of Christ, steadfast in the faith, immovable. She has gone to her reward.

W. T. HUNT, pastor.

WOOD.

Mrs. Claudia A. Wood, wife of Walter T. Wood, and daughter of M. C. and Mollie E. Smith, was born Sept. 5, 1879, in Clark county, Mo., and died at 4 o'clock P. M., Dec. 30, 1900, aged 21 years, 3 months, 25 days. She was married Feb. 15, 1900, and left a sweet little baby boy ten days old. She united with the Christian Church in September, 1900. She was a beautiful and sweet singer and was admired by all. She gave a most beautiful farewell talk to the family and said she was prepared to go. She selected her songs and sang a part of them, and outlined her funeral services, which were conducted by the writer Dec. 31, attended by a large concourse of people and the remains buried in Union Grove Cemetery, Shelby county, Mo.

Plain Pointers & Paragraphs from the Publishers.

The Controversial Library has "caught on" so to speak. We are receiving a number of orders for it, and it promises to go into the libraries of as many of our patrons as did our Biblical and Historical Library. It would be strange if our offer of this splendid set was not generally taken advantage of. The set comprises eight fine, large volumes, containing 3,317 pages. It is a collection of some of the greater religious debates in the history of the current reformation, and forms a veritable encyclopædia on the controverted topics. Two things are to be remembered about this offer. The first is that it expires February—is good only during January. The second is that you can buy it on the installment plan, provided that at the same time you order other books sufficient to make your order amount to $10.00, which is the minimum order to which the installment plan applies.

There may be some of our patrons who are really not able to secure any of the $5.00 and $10.00 sets and combinations of books that we have been offering, but we do not believe that there are any unable to purchase our One Dollar Tract Library. The man or woman who wants this great set of tracts and pamphlets can get it. The set contains twenty-seven of the best pamphlets and tracts in all our literature, and is worth considerably more than we ask for it. We are striving to "boom" the circulation of tracts, and hence make this attractive offer. If you want the set, just write your order and sent it along with a one-dollar bill. If you wait until you happen to be at the post office to get a money order you may never think of it. A money order generally means procrastination, and procrastination has spoiled many a good intention.

We understand that Christian Science Dissected has caused some disturbance among the leaders of Mrs. Eddy's disciples in the East, and that it is likely that a reply to the work will soon be published. We proposed to a member of their publication committee that they select a representative to prepare a reply, this reply to be published, at our expense, in all future editions of Christian Science Dissected. This offer was courteously declined, for reasons unknown to us. Meanwhile, our book continues to have a gratifying sale, the second edition is almost exhausted, and a third must soon be published. This work merits a large circulation. It is a plain, simple, concise examination into some of the fundamental doctrines of Mrs. Eddy. It can be understood by all. It is convincing to the honest, unprejudiced mind, and will satisfy such that Mrs. Eddy is a fraud and a charlatan. The price is 25 cents.

Practically every preacher among us, we suppose, has some of the works of Alexander Campbell. It will hardly be disputed that every preacher should have all of them. It may be that some have hesitated about ordering our Campbell Library because, having two or three of Mr. Campbell's works, they did not wish to buy duplicates. This need not hinder your taking advantage of our offer. Suppose, for example, you already have The Christian System and Christian Baptism. By referring to our General Catalogue you will find that the prices of these books are $1.00 and $.50 respectively. Just select other books from our catalogue amounting to $1.50, and e will substitute them in the Campbell Library. One thousand preachers should immediately take advantage of our offer of this Campbell Library on the installment plan—$2.00 down and $2.00 per month for four months—$10.00 in all. It will be remembered that the set includes all of Mr. Campbell's works now in print (eleven in number) and in addition Alexander Campbell's Theology, by W. E. Garrison, and the Life of Alexander Campbell, by Grafton. You will not feel the payment of $2.00 monthly, and in four months the books will be yours, all paid for.

The Old Faith Restated, edited by J. H. Garrison, is a volume whose practical worth and value can hardly be overstated. It is a series of seventeen chapters, by as many of our ablest writers, on the fundamental themes of the gospel and the constitutional features of the Church of God. It also contains full-page portraits of the several authors, with biographical sketches. These authors are McGarvey, Longan, Lamar, Haley, Grubbs, Everest, Briney, Dungan, Hobbs, Pendleton, Trible, Plattenburg, Tyler, McLean, Power, Johnson and Garrison. The book contains 500 pages. Cloth, $2.00; sheep, $2.75; half morocco, $3.00.

Studies in Acts, by W. J. Lhamon, is a book that was given a friendly reception by the brotherhood, but which deserves a much larger circulation and wider reading than it has yet had. It is fresh, vigorous and brilliant; thoughtful and thought-provoking. The author is an earnest student of the Word and of the times of the beginning of Christianity. His sentences and chapters glow with enthusiasm. If the book is not in your library, you should quickly put it there. It is a handsome volume of 420 pages, bound in cloth. Price, $1.25.

Those of ou readers who have not already done so should secure and read Facts About China, by Wm. Remfry Hunt. Mr. Hunt has lived in Central China for a number of years as a missionary of the F. C. M. S., and is well qualified to write of the country. The book does not contain a superfluous sentence. The author condenses much information in small space. The reader will learn much of the commerce, government, religion, customs, language, virtues, vices, climate, etc., of the Celestial Empire. Price, 25 cents.

Speaking of the custom of bribing Sunday-school teachers to favor certain Sunday-school supplies, which we understand is actually practiced by some publishers of supplies, we have just received a letter from a certain school. The letter says, in substance: "Last year the ——— Publishing Co. made us a present of a number of Lesson Commentaries, on condition that we use their supplies. We accepted the offer. We want to use your Commentary, too." 'Exactly! Anything worth having is worth paying for.

We recently filled an order from our general agent in Australia, which called for several hundred copies of our Lesson Commentary to be sent to Australia and New Zealand. Our brethren in the Antipodes, it seems, want only the best, and know where to get it. The Christian Lesson Commentary, moreover, goes into all the lands where we have mission stations. From all parts of the United States the orders are coming thick and fast. We had anticipated a large sale for the 1901 edition of the Commentary, and we are not being disappointed. The superiority of the Christian Lesson Commentary makes it popular, and its popularity demonstrates its worth.

N. M. Ragland's delightful work, Leaves from Mission Fields, is a book that should have a place in the home of every preacher, every C. W. B. M. worker and every one who has an interest in the great cause of missions. The volume is made up of biographical sketches of a few well-known missionaries. These sketches are beautifully written in the choicest language. The volume is superbly illustrated, printed and bound. The price is $1.00.

Every Disciple of Christ in Missouri should have The Dawn of the Reformation in Missouri, by T. P. Haley. This volume is a voluminous history of the early days of our cause in this state, with sketches of the hardy pioneers who faithfully and tirelessly toiled for the dissemination of a purer gospel. The book contains nearly 600 pages, is bound in cloth, and the price, formerly $2.00, has been reduced to 90 cents.

Remember our Standard Dictionary offer! We will send you the regular $26.00 edition of this work—the greatest lexicon of our language ever published—in two volumes, bound in full morocco or full Russia, for only $13.00—just half price! If you wish, you can pay in monthly installments—$3.00 down and $2.00 per month for five months.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

An Changes Her Mind. The Dowager Empress of China, in spite of her exalted position, freely exercises the prerogative of humbler femininity and changes her mind. First she issues a decree accepting the terms laid down by the Powers in their joint note. Then she telegraphs to her representatives not to sign until certain modifications have been made. The envoys, Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching, reply that her protest comes too late. Again she orders them not to sign. Meanwhile Russia withdraws from the allies and makes arrangements for a separate treaty with China to be negotiated in St. Petersburg. At the same time she poses as the particular friend of China and with the other hand grasps a broad slice of Manchuria. Empress An again sends to the Powers what might be considered an ultimatum, saying that she will punish only those officers named in her edict of Sept. 25 and will not agree to punish others whom the ministers may name, as the joint note provides. Then she changes her mind and orders the envoys to sign the note as it is, which they have done. The preliminary stage of the negotiations has thus been brought to an end and the subtle diplomacy of the wily children of the East can be appreciated when one notes the number of months which have elapsed between the outrages which are to be punished and the conclusion of this first step toward arranging for the punishment. It has been suggested by our State Department that the further negotiations, which will be concerned chiefly with the determination of the indemnity to be paid by China and with the formulation of new commercial treaties, be conducted elsewhere than at Pekin—for instance, at Washington. The suggestion has not been favorably received by the Powers, who consider that this would occasion still greater delays, and it has been dropped.

Senate Kills the Canteen. The United States Senate has vindicated itself against its critics by upholding the anti-canteen measure by a vote of 34 to 15. Although the committee reported in favor of a canteen amendment permitting the sale of beer, the Senate killed the substitute by a vote of more than 2 to 1 and virtually dealt a death-blow to the army canteen. This action was but little less surprising than the sweeping victory of the Bowersock amendment in the House, for many believed that the action of the House on this matter was merely a piece of subtle politics to appease the reformers and that there was an understanding that the Senate was to kill any anti-canteen measure which the House might pass. The fact is that the reformers have been unusually numerous and active in regard to this matter and have not been disposed to be appeased by anything short of an absolute anti-canteen law passed by both Houses of Congress reasonably interpreted by the Judiciary and rigidly enforced by the Executive.

Congressional Re-apportionment. As the result of each decennial census, it becomes necessary to re-apportion the representation of the states in the House of Representatives, for, while all the states are increasing in population, the rate of increase is naturally not uniform. On Tuesday of last week the House of Representatives passed the Burleigh Bill increasing its membership from 357 to 386. By this measure no state had its representation diminished; three states, New York, Illinois and Texas, gained three representatives each, three gained two, and fourteen gained one each. The debate upon this bill was not calculated to impress the listener with the high-minded patriotism of the speakers. There can be but little reasonable doubt that Congress is already too large, though it is, to be sure, smaller than most national parliaments. The most each speaker could do was to clamor for as large a representation as possible from his own state and the combined result of such a debate was naturally an increase rather than a decrease in the size of the House.

No Reduction for Disfranchisement of Negroes. The Crumpacker resolution to investigate the election laws of the several states, to determine what states had so restricted the right of suffrage that their representation ought to be reduced in accordance with the requirement of the Constitution, was voted down. Such an investigation would unquestionably have stirred up much bitter sectionalism and party feeling and in that respect it is well enough to let it drop. On the other hand it is a fact that some states, such as North and South Carolina, have restricted the right of suffrage in such a way as to deprive citizens of the United States of the right to vote. It is not a question of whether or not this is a justifiable policy in these cases. We may admit, if we choose, that the disfranchisement of the vast majority of southern negroes is the right and wise move. But as the Constitution stands at present, it is very explicit in requiring a proportionate reduction of the representation of any state, which for any reason makes the conditions of its franchise narrower than the conditions of United States citizenship.

The Passing of Stephens. On Jan. 14, Alexander M. Dockery was inaugurated governor of Missouri and Lon V. Stephens was retired to private life. Either of these events separately would be a matter of congratulation to the entire state. Mr. Dockery deserves a governorship and Mr. Stephens deserves a dim corner in the limbo of political failures. There is no politics in the change; a Democrat succeeds a Democrat. But there is a great difference in Democrats. The points at which the Stephens administration failed had nothing to do with politics, but much to do with honesty and business sagacity. Little need be said now of the retiring governor save that he was weak and open to every corrupt influence. Whether or not his own impulses were bad one had little opportunity to judge, for he was so completely dominated by the pulls of the ringsters that his own personality counted for nothing. The leading Democratic paper of St. Louis says charitably of him that "he committed a series of mistakes, broken by few exceptions, in dealing with St. Louis." In passing an election law and a police bill which deprive St. Louis of that degree of home rule which every city ought to possess, the legislature conferred upon him a power of appointment which no governor ought to be called upon to exercise. In the exercise of it he was moved always by the worst influences. But he has gone. Peace be with him! And peace also be with Missouri!

Missouri's New Governor. Mr. Dockery, the newly inaugurated governor of Missouri, is, first of all, a gentleman, a man of unquestioned integrity in public and private life; in the second place, a man of strength and business sagacity; and in the third place, a good Democrat. As a member of Congress for sixteen years, he has earned a reputation for careful attention to business, for rigid ideas of economy in the expenditure of public funds and for absolute honesty. He has come into an office in which there is much scope for the exercise of these virtues and the people of Missouri, irrespective of party, give him a hearty welcome and will be greatly surprised if he does not give us a strong and righteous administration. He is a staunch Democrat whose party loyalty has never been questioned by his fellow-partisans. He was elected as a Democrat and will doubtless give us a Democratic administration. There can be no serious objection to that. But he enters upon the duties of his office with no debts to pay and no campaign services to reward. His power of appointment is not mortgaged. In his inaugural address he confines his specific recommendations to the tax on franchises, a bill for which has already been introduced, and to a characteristic call for economy in the use of the people's money. The speech as a whole has the right ring and encourages the people in their expectation of a good administration by Mr. Dockery. We welcome him! The new Lieutenant Governor, Mr. John A. Lee, a member of the Central Christian Church of St. Louis, is a man well fitted to stand with Mr.

Dockery at the head of the government of this state and will fulfill the duties of his office in an efficient and honorable manner.

Grand Jury in St. Louis. A genuine sensation of a very wholesome sort has been created in St. Louis by the report of the grand jury, which was published on last Sunday. The grand jury has been investigating the actions of the police commissioners and the chief of police, the election commissioners and the excise commissioner in this city, and its findings have been of a sort that would have not have been received with credulity by the general public if they had not come as the official utterance of a body of unusually intelligent men who have made a thorough inquiry. It is found that the entire police department, under the control of a board appointed by Governor Stephens, has been grossly corrupt and inefficient. There has been bribery; there has been favoritism; there has been perversion of police power to the service of a corrupt ring of politicians; there has been gross neglect of duty in preserving order and preventing foul play at the polls on election day. The excise commissioner, who, like the two preceding incumbents of his office, is directly connected with the liquor business, has co-operated with the purchasable police for the virtual nullification of all the ordinances which aim to throw any safe-guards around the sale of liquor, and wine-rooms have consequently flourished in a manner far more prejudicial to morals and decency than the ordinary saloon. There is no reform needed in this city more than the wiping out of the wine-room evil and Governor Dockery cannot do a better service to St. Louis than to appoint an excise commissioner unconnected with the liquor business who will do his duty in this matter and a board of police commissioners who will see that the laws are enforced. A delegation of representative men from St. Louis, including the editor of this paper, are at present waiting upon Governor Dockery at Jefferson City to urge upon him the necessity of such action. The following dispatch was received just before going to press:

Special Dispatch to the Christian-Evangelist.

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo., Jan. 15.—Missouri's capital is full to overflowing. Spring weather added to the success of inaugural ceremonies. Delegation composed of several men representing as many religious bodies of St. Louis have had very satisfactory interview with Gov. Dockery concerning St. Louis police commissioners and excise commissioner. Have also interviewed many members of both houses concerning some needed legislation in Anti-wine-room Crusade. Prospect encouraging for help in bettering the moral condition in St. Louis. Gov. Dockery impresses us as honest, capable and courageous.

J. H. GARRISON.

Butler-Horton Contest. For several days an investigation has been in progress in St. Louis to test the validity of the election of last November in the twelfth congressional district of Missouri. This district includes the most lawless parts of St. Louis, and the election of Mr. Butler, the proprietor of the most disreputable theater in the city, by an unusually large majority, was itself a suspicious circumstance. The inquiry is not yet completed, but several points have already been demonstrated and they have been confirmed by the report of the grand jury. It has been shown that the registration lists were padded to the extent of several hundred names. Registered letters sent as a test to names on the list could not, in hundreds of cases, be delivered. In a few cases it has been proven that men voted twice in the same district. It has been proven that Mr. Butler's "gang" made the rounds of the voting places and in several instances forcibly ejected the watchers and challengers of the opposite party and that the police made no effort to preserve order. It has been shown that judges in some cases handed to intending voters ballots already marked. Appearances at present indicate that the alleged election of Mr. Butler was the result of the rankest kind of fraud. This supposition is strengthened by the refusal of the election commissioners to deliver the ballot boxes for a re-count at the mandate of the court.

The Duke and the Pope. At the head of a company of several hundred English Catholic pilgrims, the Duke of Norfolk made an address in the Vatican a few days ago which stirred up a quite unnecessary sensation, by expressing the hope that the new century would witness the restoration of the temporal power of the popes. The surprise which this utterance occasioned in many quarters is due solely to the fact that the Duke of Norfolk has until recently been a member of the British Government, having been Postmaster-General for many years. The rehabilitation of the popes in their ancient position as independent princes over a section of Italy, involves, of course, the disruption of the Italian government and the undoing of the work of Italian unification. For an official connected with a friendly government to have expressed such a wish publicly would indeed be an extraordinary act, but the Duke is merely a private citizen now and as such can utter any wild fancy that pleases him. His speech has created some alarm in England and has called out an official explanation from Great Britain to the Italian government, but in this free country we are perfectly ready to admit the right of every individual to make a fool of himself as often as he pleases and a title of nobility ought to be no bar to the exercise of that liberty. It ought not to be considered anything specially marvelous that a zealous Catholic, reared in the belief that the Supreme Pontiff is a temporal sovereign by divine right and that the occupation of Rome by secular forces is an impious resistance against the Lord's anointed, should hope that the Pope will get back his sovereignty. And it is not unnatural that he should say so when he visits the Vatican. By all means, then, let him speak his mind in peace—even if he is a duke.

South Africa. During the past week the series of small Boer victories has been interrupted by some British successes. The Burghers have been acting on the offensive in many cases and have made many attacks on British positions under cover of night or fog, but with little success. At Kaalfontein, a British garrison of 115 men repulsed a commando, the strength of which was estimated at 1,000. Four hundred Boers unsuccessfully attacked Zurfontein. Both of these cases were remarkable in that the numerical advantage was on the side of the Boers. Nothing is more impossible than to determine the approximate number of armed burghers in the field. Pro-Boer journals, such as the Manchester Guardian, claim that there are 15,000 with Botha, Delary and De Wet and 15,000 more in Griqualand and Cape Colony and scattered about in independent commandoes. As there are 17,000 Boer prisoners, it is considered by the well-informed that this estimate accounts for more Boers than there are according to the census. But whatever the number, there are enough of them to keep up lively skirmishing in several localities. It is reported that they are particularly active in the immediate neighborhood of Kimberley and that the city of diamonds is threatened with another cutting of its line of communications. General Kitchener's reports have little to say about the Cape Colony invasion and he is apparently allowing that matter to take care of itself, perhaps with the belief that it will strengthen the loyalty of the Cape Dutch to have some practical experience with the depredations of the Boers. The invaders carry no stores and must live on the land and the Dutch of Cape Colony, whose loyalty has long been questionable, may be less friendly to the Boers when forced contributions of horses and provisions have been levied from them.

Stead and Kruger. Mr. W. T. Stead, editor of the English Review of Reviews, occupies a unique position in the field of journalism. He would have made the greatest yellow journalist of the age if he had not been endowed with a keen sense of right and wrong and had not acquired the habit, inconvenient for a yellow editor, of regarding every sensation as not only a piece of news to be set forth in heavy headlines, but also a field for serious reform. And quiet, conservative folk, who after all do a good share of the reform business, consider him too excitable and erratic for a first-class reformer. At present he is devoting his attention chiefly to sympathizing with the Boers. A few days ago he visited President Kruger at the Hague and it is reported since then that it is still more probable that the exiled ex-president will come to America in April and that Mr. Stead will be with him. Mr. Stead still maintains that the European mission of the Boer president is far from being a failure; that he and his advisers still constitute a sort of Boer cabinet, or at least a traveling foreign office, and that they are doing valuable work for their cause. He knows from the inside, he says, that the Boers in the field are stronger, better armed and better disciplined than ever, and that there is absolutely no limit to the time that they can hold out and make it uncomfortable for the British. In regard to making peace on the basis of mutual concessions, he said that terms granting such a degree of independence as is enjoyed by the federated Australian colonies would very likely be favorably considered by the Boers, but that "no terms, however favorable, offered by Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Rhodes and Sir Alfred Milner, will be accepted. They do not trust these men," and will not rely upon their promises, by whatever oaths they may be supported.

Disciples of Christ in the Twentieth Century.

Continuing the line of thought of last week, under the above title, we shall indicate a few additional features in which the Disciples of Christ are likely to make progress during the coming century.

There is sure to be, in our judgment, as in all reason there ought to be, a clearer understanding of some of the principles of our movement and a more consistent application of them to existing conditions and problems. It is one thing to give our adhesion to a fundamental principle of religion, and it is quite another, as experience and all history have taught us, to understand all that is involved in that principle and that logically flows from it. There is, for instance, the principle of Christian liberty without the acceptance of which, by the pioneers in this movement, no religious reformation would have been possible. The principle is that men have the God-given right, in Christ, of examining all doctrines and institutions in the light of the divine word, and of rejecting such as do not seem to them to be in harmony with the truth as it is in Christ. Under the guidance of this principle our fathers rejected venerable symbols of faith, ancient traditions, customs and practices, and instituted a religious reformation on lines which they believed to be in harmony with the mind of Christ. No one of us has ever called in question the right of the fathers to be thus free and untrammeled from the opinionism and the accepted dogmas of their time; but it is not always remembered that we have precisely the same freedom to call in question any conclusion or practice of theirs as they had to call in question the doctrines and practices of those who preceded them. The doctrine of Christian liberty will be far better understood by all religious bodies before the present century comes to a close. We shall come to see that there can be no progress in religious truth without religious liberty, unless it be progression by division, as in the past. We will learn to love and trust each other regardless of differences of opinion, as long as there is a common faith in our common Lord, and a willingness to be governed by Him in all things. This is the principle to which we are fully committed by our position, and nothing can be more certain than that we will come to a clearer apprehension of this truth and a more consistent practice of it. Such an abuse of the principle of liberty in Christ as we witnessed in our past history in the case of those who have sought to prohibit the use of certain expedients because they are not specifically authorized in the Scriptures, is not likely to be repeated in the future among any intelligent class of Disciples. They grew out of a fundamental misconception of what is involved in a return to the Christianity of the New Testament.

The foregoing leads us to say that there will be a much clearer discrimination during the coming century between what is vital and permanent in Christianity and that which is incidental and transient. When we speak of restoring primitive Christianity, no one who rightly apprehends the phrase supposes that we are aiming to restore the manner of dress, the methods of travel, the social usages and customs, nor the kind and order of exercises in the public worship of that time. These were only incidental, and do not belong to the essentials of Christianity. Their methods of raising money, of supporting the minister and of carrying on mission work, may not be adapted to our time, and were never intended to be binding on future generations. What we desire to restore is the Christ of the New Testament, his teaching, his church, his ordinances and his life. In other words we are to have the same gospel to-day that the apostles and first Christians believed and preached. There were "differences of administration" even among the apostolic churches, and these will probably continue as long as time lasts, but methods of administration and of government are not of the essentials of Christianity. We are constantly to seek such methods of organization, administration and worship as will best embody the principles and the spirit of Christ's religion. These will not always be the same in every place and in every time. All this we shall come to see with a clearness of vision which is far from being universal at present, and the vision, when it comes, will make Christian union far more practicable than it is under present conditions. The failure to understand what is essential to Christian unity, and what belongs to the sphere of Christian liberty, has always been and is yet the chief obstacle to unity, as it has been the chief source of division.

Another illustration of the same general principle, namely, the need of growing into a fuller comprehension of what is involved in some of our fundamental principles, will be found in the question of creed. The greatest contribution made by this Reformation to the subject of Christian union was in the clear discernment on the part of our fathers of what is the fundamental faith of the New Testament—the creed of Christianity. They perceived that it was personal, not doctrinal, and that it relates to the character and mission of Jesus Christ. When Peter confessed Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of the living God, he confessed the creed of the apostolic church and of Christianity. In building upon this creed, we have builded better than many of us know. It will probably take the better part of the twentieth century to develop fully the wisdom of building upon this foundation. At present many even among the Disciples of Christ do not understand what is involved in this fundamental position and what advantage it gives us for the great work of the future. It affords an impregnable basis which no criticism can harm, and resting securely on which we have the fullest liberty to investigate all truth, to prove all things and to hold fast only to that which is good. It may be that changes necessitated in theological thought will undermine the foundations of every church that rests upon a creed-basis of doctrines formulated by men; but no possible changes of the future can destroy or overturn the personal, historic Christ, "The same yesterday, to-day and forever." Here is the only basis for unity. The twentieth century is destined to witness a mighty host of believers united on that divine basis, moving forward under the personal leadership of Christ to conquer the world. The sooner we, who have been pleading for this basis of union, come to see clearly how that position differentiates us from all those who seek a basis of fellowship in doctrinal speculations, or in uniformity of theological opinions, the sooner we shall be prepared to go forward to the accomplishment of the great mission which has been committed to us. It is only just to add that the last quarter of a century has witnessed most encouraging progress in this direction, and furnishes ground for hope of still greater progress in the century upon which we have now entered.

Hour of Prayer.

The Heavenward Guide.*

TEXT:—Nevertheless I am continually with thee: Thou hast holden my right hand. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, And afterward receive me to glory. (Psa. 73:23,24.)

In order to walk in the heavenward way we need a heavenly guide. Who this guide is is stated by the Psalmist in the above text.

Divine Counsel.

"Thou hast holden my right hand.
Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel."

This is a picture of a father and his child; the father leading the child, holding it by its right hand. So the Psalmist conceives himself as being held by the Lord and listening to and being guided by His divine counsel. But this guidance involves companionship with God. "Nevertheless I am continually with thee." One who would have the divine guidance, and who would walk in the divine counsel, must keep company with God. This means that he must do nothing so far as he knows that is contrary to God's will, and must continually seek to do the divine will in all things, asking the divine counsel. It is no small attainment to be able to have this consciousness of the divine presence and divine guidance. One who would keep in the heavenward way must not "walk in the counsel of the ungodly," but seek the counsel of the Lord and follow that.

God's Watchfulness Over Us.

"I will instruct thee and teach in the way which thou shalt go:
I will counsel thee with mine eye upon thee." (Psa. 32:38)

This is God's promise to those who wish to walk in the way of righteousness, which leadeth unto everlasting life. If we will permit Him, he will instruct us and teach us as to the way in which we shall go, and He will counsel us with His eye upon us. That is, He will keep close watch over our steps, over all our needs, and He will give us counsel as our condition may require. Perhaps if we think of a mother watching the steps of her child as it is learning to walk, encouraging it and guiding it, we will get the best idea of what the Psalmist means by the expression, "I will counsel thee with mine eye upon thee." We often feel that no one, not even God, knows about our needs and cares for us. This is a great mistake. God's watchful eye is ever over us, and He is deeply concerned in all that affects our welfare. We may go to Him for guidance when all other sources of help have failed us.

Light in Darkness.

"Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thy healing shall spring forth speedily: and thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward" (Isaiah 58:8). This is a most precious promise to those whose lives are temporarily enshrouded in darkness; who are not able to see their way clear, and who may be suffering from misrepresentation or a misconception of their aim and spirit. No matter what the nature of the cloud that shuts out the light of heaven for a time, the promise here is that if we seek counsel from God "then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thy healing shall spring forth speedily."

How beautiful is the coming of the morning after the darkness of the night! What scene in nature could so well portray the joy of light breaking into the human soul that has been groping in darkness! How many have had these experiences and realize their blessedness! Let all who are downcast and afflicted in spirit from any cause find their consolation in this sweet promise. Light shall break out of darkness, the wounded heart shall be speedily healed, and "thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward."

God's Word as a Guide.

"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet,
A light unto my path." (Psa. 119:105.)

"And we have the word of prophecy made more sure; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts" (2. Peter 1:19). These scriptures magnify the word of God as a source of spiritual light and instruction. Men of God in every age have found the holy Scriptures to afford the surest guidance in times of doubt and darkness. Those who study this word most understand best what a source of light, of comfort, of strength and of cheer it is, along the pilgrim way. Both of the passages represent it as light shining in the midst of darkness, while the passage from Peter tells us that we do well to give heed unto it as light shining in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in our hearts, that is, until morning. We most earnestly recommend the careful study of the Holy Scriptures as a source of spiritual instruction and illumination, and as the safest guide from earth to heaven.

A Guide Within.

This subject would not be complete, however, did we not refer to that promise of the Master made to His disciples on the eve of his departure, when He told them that He was going away, but that He would send unto them the Comforter who would convict the world of sin and of righteousness and of judgment. He then added: "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all the truth" (John 16:13). We may admit that this promise had a special meaning to the apostles but we may not limit the promise to them, for it is finding its fulfillment in the lives of Christians even now. He who possesses the divine Spirit as an indwelling Guest, quickening all his spiritual energies, has a guide that will help him in understanding the scriptures and all the providences of God, and all the experiences of life, as he could not otherwise understand them. It is the privilege of every true believer to claim and to possess this inward guide and monitor.

Prayer.

O Thou who didst cause the light to shine out of darkness in the beginning, and who has caused Thy glory to shine upon us in the face of Jesus Christ our Lord, do Thou so enlighten our minds by Thy word and Spirit, and so direct our steps, that we may ever walk in the way that leadeth into everlasting life. Grant us, we beseech Thee, such a measure of Thy holy Spirit as will fit us for every duty and for every trial which Thy providence may impose upon us, and having led us here in the way of righteousness and of usefulness, wilt Thou bring us at last into the glory of Thy presence through riches of grace in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

"What this old world needs more than anything else, aside from the grace of God, is human sympathy, in its struggles, its temptations, its trials." So said the preacher yesterday in an impassioned appeal for the manifestation of human kindness one to another. It was a saying worthy of the consecrated man who uttered it, and worthy of the splendid sermon of which it was a part. More and more do we realize the truth of this as we become acquainted with the inner experiences of men and women as they have been confided to us. Many a man who seems to wear a coat of mail against any intrusion on his private life or inner experience, will open his heart in response to a few words of kindness and sympathy. The average human heart hungers for sympathy and love. What it needs more than criticism, more than rebuke, more even than warning, is a word of kindly recognition and ecouragement. We do not always give people credit for their good intentions and for their desires and aspirations after a better life. We do not always stop to reckon with the forces which are arrayed against them in their efforts to live better lives. We are more ready, as a rule, to condemn the wrong than we are to commend the good in our fellowmen. This is a mistake of the head rather than of the heart. We imagine a rebuke for wrongdoing will do our brother more good than a commendation of any worthy act of his. As a rule, at least, this is a mistake. A better knowledge of human nature and of the spirit and method of Christ would make this clear to us.

The preacher illustrated his point by an incident in recent history. Some ministers in a certain city waited upon the mayor in a body to protest against a certain act of his which they deemed prejudicial to the moral interest of the city. He heard their complaint and then said in substance: "Gentlemen, not long ago I was led to take an official course in the interest of what I believed to be right and just, which greatly imperiled my political prospects, and caused me no small sacrifice, in the way of personal popularity. I heard no word of commendation from you ministers for this official act in the interest of the moral welfare of the community. But when I perform an act which you deem to be wrong you are quick to utter your word of condemnation. In contrast with this the people who approve my latest act have been prompt to express their approval and to pledge their support to me in carrying it out. There may be something in these facts that is worth your thinking over." And with this he politely dismissed them. We believe there is something in the foregoing facts that is worth the consideration, not only of ministers of the gospel, but of all who favor moral and social reform. Mayors and other officials are human beings like the rest of us, and they need words of encouragement to strengthen them in their official duty, and when they do perform official acts showing moral courage, they are entitled to the prompt approval of all good citizens. This would serve to convince them that their actions are being closely scanned, not only by those who make politics a business, but by the good people of the city and community, and that they can rely on the moral sentiment of the community to support them.

We believe it was the epigrammatic editor of "The King's Business" who remarked that "a flower in the sick room is worth a whole bouquet at the funeral." This is a true saying, and worthy of universal acceptation. Too many people postpone the flowers for the casket which should have gladdened the heart of the living. Sometimes a faithful wife and mother staggers through life with her heavy burden without any token of tender affection from her husband, who, when the tired feet are at rest and the weary heart is still, breaks the alabaster box of his love above the coffin. Who knows but that if it had been broken earlier there might have been no need of casket for many years to come? In "scattering seeds of kindness" it is a good idea to see that some of them fall on the neglected soil of hearts that gather about our own fireside. Let us also scatter them upon the torn and bleeding hearts of the world's poor, disappointed and discouraged ones who have been worsted in life's battle, and who feel that it is hardly worth while for them to try again. They know their lives have been failures and do not need to be told that. They need some one to point out how even their failures may become stepping stones to success. In a word, they need some one with the spirit and intuition of Jesus, to speak the word of comfort that shall send them along their way, stronger to endure and to do.

It is written of Jesus that after his agony in Gethsemane, "the angels came and ministered to him." In what way did they minister to him in that awful hour? It was not material food he needed, or hungered for, but sympathy. His most faithful disciples slept while he agonized. They could not "enter into the fellowship of his sufferings," as Paul was able to do many years afterwards. He was treading the winepress alone. But the angels understood the meaning of the mysterious struggle better than mortals. Did they not bring him some word of appreciation and sympathy from the unseen world? Moses and Elijah, on the occasion of their appearance on the Mount of Transfiguration, held a conversation with Jesus concerning his coming crucifixion. This implies that they had a better understanding of what was to befall Christ than his disciples had. If the spirits of the departed were thus in advance of those in the body, on this great question, surely the unfallen spirits would be in a condition to sympathize with the Man of Sorrows in his struggles for the world's redemption, as no man in the flesh could do. Do they not also minister to us who are heirs of salvation? So teaches the letter to the Hebrews. If, then, the heart of Christ hungered for sympathy, and if angels ministered to him and minister to us in our moments of supreme need, we ought also, to the measure of our ability, to extend sympathy and encouragement to those who are in need of it and whose lives would be made brighter by it.

Questions and Answers.

Does the soul of man die?

Mrs. A. K. F.

Ursa, Ill.

This depends upon what is meant by the "soul." It is sometimes used interchangeably with the word spirit, though there are two Greek words for these two words in English. When used as the equivalent of spirit, it refers to the undying nature of man. The spirit may be alienated from God by sin, and so become dead in a moral sense; but there is no evidence that it ever ceases to exist as the conscious, rational part of human nature. This is the part that has affinity and capacity for God, and that finds its highest happiness and noblest development in union with God. The soul, when used in the sense of the basis of the physical life, with its emotions and sensibilities, may be said to perish with the dissolution of the body. There is a theory, however, held by some that it contains the nucleus of the spiritual body which is to be in the life to come.

1. The first century was "lived" between the beginning of the year 1 and the end of the year 100.

2. The passage cited is an admonition to women to dress modestly and soberly, and not to regard their chief ornament as braided hair and gold or pearls or costly raiment, but as consisting of modesty, godliness and good works—an admonition which is not yet out of date.

Editor Christian-Evangelist:—One of the young ladies of my church married a gentleman whose people are all Lutherans. A little girl has been born to the young couple. I was waited upon in reference to christening the child. Of course this I would not do and explained why. They were much disappointed and desired that I suggest some form of dedicating the child leaving out the baptism. I have thought out a plan which I submit for your consideration. I read in the Word of God that Jesus called the children to Him, took them in His arms and blessed them. Can I or any other brother do the same? Am I violating any practice or precept of the Gospel if I go to the family, read an appropriate passage, offer a prayer, and thus reverently dedicate the little life to God? We have a religious service in our marriages, we have a religious service when we bury the dead, is it out of place to have a religious service at the birth of a child? We refuse to baptize infants, and rightly. Would reading and prayer be objected to? Richard.

Not only would there be no violation of any practice or precept of the gospel in reading the Scriptures and offering a prayer of dedication for the young child, but we should say it would be entirely in harmony with the spirit and teaching of Jesus. We would be glad to see the custom become universal—that of parents dedicating their new-born child to God and themselves to the bringing of it up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. The calling of the minister in on such an occasion is entirely appropriate. If such a practice should become general among Christians, it would displace what is called infant baptism, which is without sanction in the New Testament, and would assist parents in carrying out the divine injunction of bringing up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

1. Is the Jewish law binding on the people of to-day?

2. Are Christians who do not observe the Sabbath or seventh day of the week as a rest day, under condemnation?

3. Why did the Jews observe the seventh day?

4. Why do the Christians observe the first day of the week?

5. Was the Sabbath day ever changed from the seventh to the first day of the week?

J. R. Simpson.

Connersville, Ind.

1. Only such parts of it as are moral, and these are taken up and incorporated in the New Testament. The Old Testament, however, is inspired and profitable for its teaching, its history, its prophecy, and its devotional literature.

2. No, there is no command under Christ for observing the Jewish Sabbath.

3. Because God in the Mosaic law commanded them so to do; but we are not under Moses, but under Christ.

4. Because of Christ's resurrection from the dead on that day, and because the apostolic church was accustomed to meet on the first day of the week.

5. No, the Sabbath was not changed. It was abolished. The Lord's day is a new day, celebrating a new event and is observed in a somewhat different spirit. Both, however, were intended to promote human welfare.

In going around among the churches I occasionally meet with some one who thinks the editor of the Christian-Evangelist has abandoned the doctrine of baptism for remission of sins. I tell them it is not so. Am I right? Traveler.

Of course you are right, brother. But you will not convince our accusers. Alexander Campbell, and all of us, have been charged with denying the Holy Spirit, because he and the rest of us have held a different view from that generally held as to the Spirit's method of convicting of sin. Some people cannot distinguish between their interpretation of a Bible doctrine, and the doctrine itself. We do not think the relation of baptism to remission of sins has always had a proper setting among us. It has not infrequently been presented in a bald, legalistic way, quite out of harmony with the teaching of Christ; but the numerous passages that establish a relation between baptism and remission of sins cannot be ignored or explained away. Rightly understood the doctrine is a great help, not a hindrance, in the work of evangelization.

Is it unscriptural for the preacher, in the absence of the elders of the church, to call on a worthy deacon to officiate at the Lord's table? J. M. Michael.

Certainly not. Jesus told his disciples to "do this in memory of me," while as yet there was neither elder nor deacon. The idea of "officiating" is the least prominent of all in connection with the Lord's Supper. If the loaf is broken, the wine poured, the elements partaken of and the Lord remembered, his wish is fulfilled and every scriptural requirement satisfied.

Current Religious Thought.

The following statement, quoted by The Advance, a conservative journal, from an editorial in Zion's Herald, another conservative journal, on Professor Nash's new book on "The History of Higher Criticism," expresses a very wide consensus of opinion, we take it, among level-headed men generally.

"It will be seen that the higher critics are not men who, for insufficient reasons, are breaking the peace of the church. They are pursuing a divine calling, discharging a sacred obligation, doing the same work that the fathers and scholastics and reformers did, and doing it better. Some of them, it is true, have spoken unadvisedly, have set up cliques for purposes of mutual admiration, have become conceited, have known too much, have rushed prematurely to conclusions which do not stand the test of more searching examinations; but the sins of critics no more impair the authority and value of criticism than the sins of churchmen impair the church's right of existence. Nor, because the study of the New Testament is now less dogmatic and more historical, does it need to be less devotional, less rich in spiritual suggestion, less helpful to growth in grace. The beauty of the Word may for a time be impaired by our analytical study of its sources, but in the end its power to cheer our hearts and strengthen our purposes will be the greater, by reason of our deeper knowledge of the way in which the mind of God has been revealed. 'Higher criticism'—in other words, modern Bible study, or the best road to the original meaning of the Holy Scripture—becomes, on this view, a saving necessity of the very life of the church, laid upon us by its Lord and Master, and when the temporary loss and confusion inseparable from so considerable alteration in old established views have passed away, it will be very clearly seen that God was in the movement, and that he has worked out by means of it no little glory to himself."

The following choice bit, bearing directly on the subject of Presbyterian creed-revision and indirectly on the whole question of the use of creeds, is from the Interior.

When the sharks followed the little ships of Columbus, hoping to feast on a stumbling sailor, it was the custom to throw a stout empty cask overboard which the shark could not smash. The cask was of no use or value except to bother the shark. That is what "our fathers" did when Rome was pursuing them. As there were a good many sharks, from time to time, in their wake, a good many casks and tubs of various kinds were thrown to them. Then came a generation of sailors over the same seas, in less disturbed or dangerous times, and out of veneration for their predecessors, men began to gather them up, and label them and set them in systematic rows in the hold of their ship. Before all this was accomplished it was found that a large number and variety of old casks were cumbering the ship to the exclusion of useful and usable articles of freight, and when it was proposed to unload them, there arose a party in protest. They made long speeches and wrote treatises and articles to prove that the sole object in building and sailing the ship was to carry the casks and tubs. "What is the ship for," they demanded, "if not for carrying the tubs? Take away the tubs and what claim would the ship have for existence?" But Columbus discovered America. That was the object of his sailing of which the casks and tubs were only an incident.

The pastor of the First Methodist Church of Des Moines is reported as saying that he thought the time had passed when the church could be built up by the old-fashioned revival. Old creeds and old evangelistic methods will not do unless they are the very oldest of all.

The revival meeting conversion is not always full of sincerity. The circumstances are strained and unnatural and the best results are not obtained through them. The more quiet religious feeling is the stronger because it is the kind that speaks in deeds rather than in emotional demonstrations.

The Methodist Church cannot continue to hold its place if it relies too much upon revival meeting conversions. Too much stress has been put upon them in the past. After all it is the will which is the strongest factor in character building. It is what we do that entitles us to the name of Christian and not what we say we feel. The truth of the past will live, but because it is truth and not because it belongs to the past.

Growth of Democracy During the XIXth Century

By HON. CHAMP CLARK, M. C.

Beginning of Modern Democracy.

One of the most astounding phenomena of the wondrous nineteenth century is the marvelous growth of the democratic idea of self-government. It has traveled with more than seven-league boots. As a grower it has double-discounted Jonah's gourd vine. It has revolutionized and blessed the world. When Thomas Jefferson, the chief priest, apostle and prophet of civil liberty, penned the fateful sentences, "All men are created equal" and "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," he wrote the death-warrant of king-craft throughout the world and proclaimed himself the greatest iconoclast and leader that has appeared on earth since the Savior of mankind was crucified.

When the Revolutionary Congress published his twin ideas to a startled world as the creed of a new nation and, after seven years of awful war, Washington made good that glorious declaration on Yorktown's bloodstained heights, we became ex necessitate the propagandists of the idea of human freedom on every foot of the habitable globe—an idea which will go on with its perfect work of regeneration till all who wear the human form divine, from Greenland's Icy Mountains to India's Coral Strand, shall enjoy in its fullness the inalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, with no task-master to make them afraid or to rob them of their earnings. The leaven of liberty placed in the human heart by the great Virginia farmer and his co-laborers will continue to work and work and work until the entire mass of humanity is thoroughly leavened. The seed of liberty which they planted in love of man, through the instrumentality of Almighty God has, like the mustard tree of Scripture, grown and spread until it has covered the earth with its refreshing shade.

We Did It.

The triumphant progress of this idea can be no more stopped than can the ceaseless operation of the law of gravitation or the fructifying influences of the sun; for with the exception of a little handful of brainless, dudish, un-American Anglomaniacs, who disgrace the country with their presence here, every one of our 77,000,000 people, wherever he may be, by land or sea, is an enthusiastic missionary for the propagation of the gospel of self-government.

Since this idea which has glorified us and made us what we are was first sent forth on its mission into the world, crowns have been falling, thrones have been tumbling, dynasties have been disappearing, kings have been fleeing for their lives and republics have been forming in both hemispheres. The unnatural doctrine of "government by divine right" is in articulo mortis and, gloria in excelsis, we did it. Americans did the deed. We wounded it past all surgery. We gave it its coup de grace. Mark Twain says: "Blessed is the man who bloweth his own horn, lest it be not blown." And we did it. Standing upon the threshold of the new century, reviewing the achievements of the old, we can proudly and justly point to the twenty-six republics of the world and say: "We di dit. We made these!"

It matters not that the idea of one-man government occasionally seems to be galvanized into new life and appears sporadically as in the cases of Mr. Gladstone's "Two Young Despots," it is perishing slowly but surely from the Land of the Midnight Sun to the Rock of Gibraltar.

It took Rome 1,200 years to die. "Government by Divine Right" has been dying 124 years. The death rattle is in its throat everywhere and in another century it will be as dead as the men who lived before the flood. And we did it. This is our clearest title to imperishable renown.

Twenty-six Republics.

When our fathers published the great Declaration, this was the only republic on the whole face of the earth and they were not certain that it would survive till Christmas. Now every foot of the land southward to Cape Horn—except British Guiana—is within the confines of a republic; certain islands of the seas are ruled by republics; there are three republics in Europe and four in Africa and God grant there may never be any less! Every one of these 26 republics owes its existence to our example and to our success in self-government. We did it. Perpetual motion has at last been realized in the victorious march of the democratic idea. "When the Devil of Tyranny once enters the body politic," says Macaulay, "it departs not but by struggles, by groanings and by great convulsions." The truth of that utterance of the matchless historian has been demonstrated over and over again in the nineteenth century.

Democracy in France.

The French were the first to catch from us the spirit of '76. The soldiers whom Louis the Sixteenth sent to help fight our battles carried back with them to their native land the seeds of liberty, which, falling upon fertile soil, germinated, grew and bore fruit which astonished the world. The King, the Queen, their children and their nobility lost their heads; the ancient monarchy was destroyed; upon its ruins rose the Directory, too imbecile and too feeble to survive. Then came Napoleon with his bloody phantasmagoria, the retreat from Moscow, Elba, the Hundred Days, Waterloo, St. Helena and the Restoration; then the revolution of 1830, with Louis Philippe and his mercenary reign; then the Second Republic which was stabbed to death in the house of its friends; then Louis Napoleon—Victor Hugo's "Napoleon the Little"—with his tinsel empire with Metz, Sedan and Thiselhurst in the vista; then the Commune with its crimson horrors; and finally, as the substantial good and crowning mercy of so much blood and so many upheavals, the Third Republic, which appears to be founded upon a rock.

South America and Mexico.

Next, South America became infected with the spirit of '76, and rose in revolt against Spanish despotism. Simon Bolivar came to rival Washington in the world's great pulsing heart, and a bevy of Spanish-American Republics sprang into being beneath the southern cross. The Central American states followed the inspiring example; and, Mexico, our nearest neighbor on the south, achieved her liberty under Juarez, which has been perpetuated and placed on an enduring basis by that illustrious soldier, patriot and statesman, Porfirio Diaz. When the roll of freedom's great champions is finally made up, Juarez and Diaz will occupy conspicuous places thereon. If I had a prayer for Mexico that could be granted, it would be that General Diaz might live forever and be President all the time. We have a right to felicitate ourselves especially on Mexico's later career and slendid progress, for it was our opportune and energetic assertion of the Monroe Doctrine which drove the French invaders from her soil, toppled Maximilian's mushroom empire in the dust, and gave the brave young republic a chance to work out her own destiny.

In 1823, Greece, after centuries of debasing servitude, rose against the Unspeakable Turk, and, under the lead of Marcos Bozzaris, reviving the glory of her better days, achieved her independence.

Still others might be cited, Cuba being the last to lay hold of the democratic idea—the theory of self-government.

Democratic Spirit in Monarchies.

We would, however, fall far short of understanding the full growth of democracy in the last century, if we confined our attention to those nations which have assumed the republican form—the outward sign of an inward grace, for there is scarcely a nation under the sun whose government has not been liberalized and made to approximate a democracy during the nineteenth century. Indeed, we have become more democratic ourselves than we were in 1776. The ultimate symbol of perfect democracy is universal suffrage. We now have universal male suffrage, coupled with sporadic cases of female suffrage. In the early years of the republic, suffrage was far from universal, even among our men, being hedged about with many conditions and qualifications. In this country it is not probable that suffrage will be curtailed so long as the republic exists. Our duty is clear and imperative to make the voter fit for the exercise of the right preservative of all rights.

Spain was a republic once and will be again. With the single exception of Russia, every nation in Europe has a Parliament or Congress, called by various names, which is really the governing body, Kings, Queens, Princes and Emperors being more figureheads than anything else. By Lord Grey's reform bill and other reform bills passed within the century just gone, Great Britain has step by step extended the elective franchise until her suffrage system approximates the universal male type. It is questionable whether any monarch in Europe, barring the Czar, possesses as much power as the President of the United States.

Pass the Torch from Hand to Hand.

Our government is not perfect, for nothing human is perfect, but nevertheless for little more than a century it has been the model, which all others have sought to copy. If it be true that imitation is the sincerest flattery, we have abundant cause for self-congratulation. The democratic idea, like John Brown's soul, still goes marching on.

In reviewing the string of revolutionary events, Tom Moore, the poet laureate of Ireland and the human heart, says:

"I saw the expectant nations stand
To catch the coming flame in turn;
I saw from ready hand to hand
The clear but struggling glory burn.

"And Oh! their joy as it came near;
'Twas in itself a joy to see—
While Fancy whispered in my ear,
'That torch they pass is liberty!'

"And each, as she received the flame,
Lighted her altar with its ray,
Then, smiling to the next who came,
Speeded it on its sparkling way.

. . . . . .

"Take, Freedom! Take thy radiant round
When dimmed, revive—when lost, return;
Till not a shrine on earth be found,
On which thy glories shall not burn!"

And those words of the poet should be the prayer of every American worthy of his priceless heritage of freedom.

Prayer.

Ben Greenstein.

Prayer is a sacred instinct of the human soul. It is a spiritual habit of man. It ascends from a cradle as well as from a dying bed.

Antiochus shocked Israel by defiling the temple utensils, but Huxley shocked Christendom by rudely challenging the Christians for a single reply to their prayers. The air is fairly alive with prayers. Have you ever thought how many people pray and the number of times they pray? If all the prayers made in one day could be recorded, the libraries of America could not hold them in book-form. Think of the crude, fetich prayers of hundreds of millions of simple Africans. Think of four hundred million Chinese praying every day. Think of the millions of Mohammedans who pray five times a day. Think of ten million Jews who pray three times a day. Think of the prayers of Christendom, which never cease. Can you appreciate the thought that, when you pray, millions are praying with you?

Pagan, Papist and Protestant pray simultaneously to the same God in divers ways and means.

Prayer is the outlet from earth to heaven. It is humanity presenting its direst needs to divinity.

The Bible contains God's communication to man, but prayer is man's communication to God.

When Marconi announced his invention of wireless telegraphy, the scientific world was astounded. But Jesus announced a spiritual system of wireless telegraphy two thousand years ago. Prayer is the wireless telegraphy of the soul.

Prayer is not sacred poetry but sincere petition. It is not a solemn oration but an earnest expression of our daily needs. There are carloads of prayers that are nothing more than phraseological gymnastics. They go no higher than the roof, and are as full of meaning as an empty barrel. Many assume an appearance of artificial seriousness when they pray but nothing is more natural than prayer. Remember that we are children of God, God is our father. Of course familiarity must not be interpreted as naturalness. There should be a dignified naturalness about us. "Familiarity breeds contempt" is a maxim appropriate to those who think they should be familiar in an undignified manner.

Again, there are many public prayers that are not petitions to God but addresses to the audience. This is a sacrilege, because it is taking advantage of an audience by means of one of the most sacred things on earth. The difference between a public and a private prayer should be this. Public prayer has only a larger scope than private prayer. Prayer should never be preaching but petitioning.

Another timely question about prayer is, when should we pray?

I sincerely believe we should pray only when we have exhausted the means within our reach.

God does not waste his divine energy.

Suppose a man has a headache, which should he do first, go to God, or use what God has already given him to alleviate such ailments? The latter is obvious. Yet there are many who fail to recognize nature's laws which God hath ordained and go to God asking him to make special laws for their special benefit.

Take an illustration in the moral world and see how this works. Suppose a young man is addicted to the habit of profanity. Which should he do, ask God to stop him or try to stop himself? Suppose he does the former and his prayer is answered, can he sincerely and heartily give unstinted praise to God? I say he cannot. Why? Because he never tried to stop and he doesn't know whether he could have stopped by self-effort or not. How can he praise God wholly as long as there is a doubt in his mind?

It would be more of a credit to God for him to cease his profanity by self-effort, because he is the product of God's creation and Satan is trying to master him in the form of profanity. If he masters profanity he has mastered Satan. It shows that God's products are stronger than the greatest adversary in the world hence God should be the object of our highest praise. Use all God's known laws first. Don't degrade your religion by acknowledging the weakness of your Creator.

Another thing, remember that praying hearts should supersede prayer-books. The prayers in prayer-books should never be used unless you are convinced that they are the accurate expressions of your heart's wish. Every prayer should possess an element of originality.

Read your prayers from your heart; they are the truest. Grammarless prayers are better than prayerless grammar. Don't be artificially poetic, but be truly serious. There are many who would blush if they made a mistake in grammar during the course of their prayers. So many pray as if they were being examined in grammar. God reads desires and not technical language.

Finally, make your disposition one of prayer. A praying disposition is what God wants when Paul says, "pray without ceasing." Pray privately more than publicly. Preparation for prayer is more needful than prayer itself. Prepare more than pray. Last of all remember God answers negatively as well as affirmatively. "No" is as much of an answer as "Yes." And we should be as obedient to a negative answer as to an affirmative.

Evolution at Bartlett's Landing.

By Burris A. Jenkins.

CHAPTER II.

On Thursday night of that same week Jane saw the stars as bright as if no boat twelve hours away were coming down the stream. Not an eye in the heavens seemed dimmed with the mists that, these three days past, had so often come into her own. The three nights since she heard of the going away she had come, as her custom was, to the stile and the deep spring by the road, for her father's good-night gourd of coolness. Three nights, and Henry had not passed that way, hunting his cow, or a sheep that had strayed, as he was so often wont to do. When before had those cattle ever been so tame? Jane was all out of patience, they were so spiritless and law-abiding. As she sat looking down into the water, four feet below the ground, the green-grown stones walling in the little well, the unshaken surface stealing the very stars out of the sky, Jane was nearer finding fault with Henry than she had ever been before.

"Four years is a long time," she murmured, "Four years—"

"Jane," said a deep, soft voice from the stile behind her.

"Oh!" and Jane laughed a foolish, sobbing laugh. Why would she be so silly when this man was near, whom she had known from a boy! Why should he rob her of all resource, when, in his presence, of all others, she had need, especial need, of wit? Why could she never, with him, extricate herself from a certain embarrassment that, after all, was pleasurable? Why could she never make apt replies, jest, coquette, advance, retreat, as she could with other men? And yet she confessed she would not, if she could, have shaken off the thraldom of this helplessness. For once here was a bird in a net that cared not for its wings again.

"Four years a long time, Jane?"

"Of course. It's four years since my black and white cow was born, and she's grown such a lot; and it's four years since Jesse James ran away from home and stayed six months, and he's no better now than then; and it's four years since Benton said at Liberty there'd be a great city at Westport Landing at the mouth of the Kaw, and there's no city started yet; and it's four years since you and Kate Long stood up at the Turkey Creek spelling-bee to spell down a poor, helpless, lone girl like me and couldn't; it's four years since—O, yes, four years is an awfully long time and lots of things can happen in four years." This is what she ought to have said, but she didn't think of it till she got to bed that night. All she did say was, hesitatingly:

"Yes, long time."

"And you're sorry I'm going?"

"Y-yes."

"But I'll come back."

"Y-yes."

"And you'll be here then."

"Y-yes."

"And wait for me, Jane?" as he seized her hand.

"Y-yes."

The magic word had been spoken. It was the first time he had asked her to speak it, nor had he intended to, even then. He had not wished to bind her, for he knew the dangers ahead. So, even in the midst of the happiness of the moment, he was conscious of an undercurrent of foreboding.

How many there are, no doubt, who, in those first moments of plighted troth, when they feel they ought to be serenely happy, are surprised to encounter a certain uneasiness. Jane, to be sure, in her ignorance of the possible future that Henry foresaw, had less of this disturbance of mind than he. Soon, to both of them, fortunately, as the minutes flew, there came a growing security that was token of deep feeling.

We can safely pass over the rest of their conversation. It might not edify. Henry's rhetoric was not such as would particularly adorn these pages. But Jane, poor, blinded girl, thought he spoke more beautifully than ever he had before, and even in the pauses, when his lips were not occupied with speaking, she thought him wondrous eloquent.

Next morning the usual crowd stood on the bank when the boat landed—the usual crowd, with a few unusual additions. The Bartletts all three were there, as well as the widow Winfield and her two sons, and the few others who knew of Henry's departure.

Ten minutes of the mate's swearing, and of the negro roustabouts' imperturbable shuffling had sufficed to land the few boxes of freight consigned to Bartlett's Landing. The bell rang coldly, the gang-plank was swung up by the windlass, and the little stern-wheeler chow-chowed as she drew her nose out of the clay-bank.

On the shore, the younger brother, Tom, was absorbed by the voices of officers calling out orders; the widow's eyes were streaming; a light of mingled joy and sadness shone on the face of Elder Bartlett as he waved his broad hat to Henry; Mrs. Bartlett's eyes swam in mist as she furtively watched her daughter; Jane smiled a fitful smile, doing her best to be nonchalant because of the presence of sundry half-suspecting lads and lassies, and, indeed, succeeded indifferently well. Wonderful sphinxes are women!

It is not ours to follow that little steamer down her winding shoal-and-deep way. If she had good luck she reached St. Louis in seven or seventy days. It is not ours to follow Henry down the Mississippi to Cairo, and up the Ohio nearly to Pittsburg; not ours to disembark with him at a little river town and drive seven miles into the beautiful bosom of West Virginia hills; not ours to watch him through four years of study and development.

Nor, indeed, is it ours to wait where the flowing months and years rolled past Bartlett's Landing, as the river flowed between its yellow banks of clay. Sometimes, for those who watched and waited there, the days went by like the tawny current swift and strong; and then again they seemed to stand and circle, ebb back and eddy round and round, before they joined the general rush of time.

Letters came and went, to be sure, on the slow boats, so that the absent student knew the faithfulness of his western maid. She allowed him to know that her rural social life continued as before, but she said no word to him of the death she was compelled to deal to the hopes of certain strong and able riders of the west. She considered these things misfortunes to be hid.

Two winters she spent in Jefferson City, while the Elder represented his district in the State Assembly. In this larger world, likewise, her health and beauty, her tact and self-possession, her sincerity and good sense, had conquered many. Indeed, an eloquent young representative, lately from Kentucky, had declared in a toast, "The Ladies," that a certain young woman—all understood the reference—had "dead-locked the State's Assembly, sir, in both branches, Governor and page-boys included, sir; locked them in the golden chains of a despotism sweet to serve, and brought every slave of us kneeling at her feet, sir!" Whereupon there was great cheering by all the men, blushing by Miss Jane Bartlett, and smiling by all the ladies. For, strange to relate, she still held sway over the hearts of women as of men, wondering all the while why they came to her with confidential tales.

Thus it came about that the Governor's wife drew Jane to St. Louis during the other two winters, and into the larger circles which revolved about the Governor's city home. Long after, Henry confessed to Jane that, when her first letter came to him from St. Louis, waves of fear broke over him; although the tempest soon passed and the waves were stilled. Nor need he be in dread, for here as well, like David and Diana, she passed scathless amid her slain. Cattle-kings and cotton-kings, political-kings and river-kings, poker-players and Indian-fighters, wild young rakes and staid old merchants—all laid at her feet their crowns or their dollars, their sins or their hearts, as the case might be, but vainly. Nobody knew the secret of her impregnability—the letters sent and received by the packets of the Ohio.

How to Study Paul's Epistles.*

C. B. Newnan.

Any wise study of Paul's Epistles must be prefaced by a study of the man and his remarkable career. Possessed of a personality so rugged and striking, passing through an epoch-making experience in his conversion, giving himself up to Christ's service with a singleness and intensity of devotion never surpassed in human history; it is not strange that his epistle should so wondrously reflect the man, or that we must know him in order to understand them. The student should familiarize himself with the race, parentage and birthplace of this remarkable man; should know of his boyhood's training and of the calling by which he earned his livelihood. He should learn concerning the Jerusalem schools and the ambitions of Paul and his people as he came thither to school. One should know of his remarkable progress in the school of Gamaliel and of the esteem in which he was held by the leaders of his people. Make particular note of his prominence in connection with the persecution of the early Christians.

Pay particular attention to the supreme importance in his history of his conversion (Gal. 1:11-17. Compare also Acts 6:22-26). Note next his adjustment of himself to the new conditions; and his absolute committal of himself to the proclamation of the faith. The history of his relation to the Antioch Church is a most beautiful story. The record of his great missionary journeys, three in number, is most practical, and yet filled with incidents of heroism, sacrifice and service. His long imprisonment is tragic and touching and most marvelously enriches his own life and also the church. Note his probable release, his re-imprisonment, and finally the triumphant closing of his great career (2 Tim. 4:6-8). Study of these, and many other things which will suggest themselves as we go along, will make us ready, with heightened expectation and keen zest, to take up the study of the epistles. In the course of their study three things must be gotten in mind:

*Supplementary reading in Bethany C. E. Reading Course.

I. The Historic Setting.

By the Historic Setting of the particular epistle under consideration is meant a knowledge of the personages, facts and circumstances connected with the origin of the epistle. Why did Paul write it? Where was he when it was written? How was he circumstanced? What relation did he bear to those to whom the epistle was written? It makes a vast deal of difference whether he knew or did not know those to whom he wrote. Compare, by way of illustration, the stately, even, quiet flow of his great argument addressed to the Romans, a church which, up to the time of his writing to them, he had never seen, with the vehement, hurried, earnest, elliptical, personal form of his letter to the Galatians. Both letters have the same theme, both contain practically the same lines of argument, but how different the style. The Galatians were his own children in the gospel, and were now in imminent danger of departure from the faith.

Inform yourself as to the conditions under which he writes. For example, his letters from prison breathe a ripeness and fullness of chastened experience which the earlier letters do not show. Compare Galatians with Philippians for illustration.

The laws, religions, customs, habits, recreations of a people should be in mind, that they may illumine his letter to that people. Note here, as one of the finest possible illustrations, his letters to the Corinthians, which will lose much of their force if the customs of the City of Corinth be not in mind. All these things and many others not named belong to the Historic Setting.

II. The Analytic Outline.

Having gotten all of the circumstances that shed light upon the epistle, we are ready now to seek the Analytic Outline. In getting this the epistle should be read and re-read again and again until one is fairly steeped in its thought and life. Then you are ready to attempt its outline. In doing this work it may be said that a revised Bible, paragraph edition, will be found most helpful. Suffer also this remark, any analysis which, with study and care, you may make for yourself, no matter how poor it may be, will be better for you than the finest outline which another may be able to place at your disposal. You will seek first the introduction, then the main divisions and subdivisions of the epistle, and finally the benediction at the close.

III. The Heart-message.

Your analysis being made, you are now ready to seek that without which all the rest would be of but little worth, namely, the Heart-message of the epistle.

What are the lessons for the culture of life which the apostle is trying to teach? And here upon your knees you will need to study, saying, "O Lord, open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law."

What Most Interests Me Now

By J. S. LAMAR

I.—Introduction.

I have been honored by a request to contribute a few articles to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST upon any subject that I might select. The distinguished editor, in extending the invitation, was pleased to say to me: "You are standing now near life's summit and looking across the way you have come and the experiences you have had, and you doubtless have some deep convictions or lessons which you would like to leave to your brethren;" and he added, as an incentive to my compliance, "I am sure it would be a blessing to the cause you love." As for myself, while I cannot cherish the same confident assurance, I comply simply in the hope that my humble efforts may, by God's blessing, be not wholly fruitless of good.

It will be seen from the above that not only is my age kindly recognized as a fact, but that I am expected to write as an old man. This diminishes the reluctance that I should otherwise feel in coming again before the public; for I am well aware that even such feeble powers as might at one time have been placed to my credit, have been greatly impaired by time and my ever-present infirmities. If, therefore, my readers discern, as they surely will, evidences of failing strength—with the loss of some of that buoyancy and brightness of spirit, once natural to me, I beg them to believe that I also am sensible of it and, moreover, that I am, as they cannot be, distressed and mortified by it. We have now a number of very able men in our ranks. Their splendid contributions to our literature I read with unaffected pleasure, and with no feeling of jealousy or envy—rejoicing that God has given us so many gifted and scholarly champions of the truth, especially so many young men whose ample equipment and thorough training place them so far in advance of any position that I might ever have been entitled to occupy.

Still, it is possible that some persons may feel curious to know what a worn-out old preacher, whose race is run and whose work is practically ended, is really thinking about. They will ask, What subjects fill his mind? What reasons can he give why these should be so absorbing, while others which seem to be more pressing and urgent should be esteemed by him as of secondary and only transient importance? He has lived through a stirring period of Christian thought and development, has taken part in the discussion of its more significant phases, and has tried to weigh and estimate its more influential forces and its doctrinal and vital tendencies, as they severally presented themselves and we should like to know what he has got, or thinks he has got, out of it all. Of this vast range of thought and faith and feeling, much has passed away; being connected with the temporal and the transient, its interest and in large measure its value have perished with the momentary occasion which gave it factitious interest and importance; what we wish to know is, What is left? What are the things that remain? What are the convictions that have not simply an outward connection with him, but which are a part of his very life, which seem to connect him with the very source of life?—the truths which shed their radiance through the darkness of a tried and sorrowful past, and give strength and support to a feeble and well-nigh helpless present?

I must take occasion to say here, once for all, that I am not, as some might suppose, living in the past. My friends seem to think that, being an old man, I must be mainly a sort of store-house of memories; that these are ever present with me and pressing for utterance; that I could tell deeply interesting stories and give instructive incidents connected with the men and the movements for the past fifty or sixty years; that these are all engraven upon my mind as a vivid and detailed picture; and that there is nothing I love so well as to sit down and talk about this picture. I suppose I ought to be such a man; it seems to be expected of me; and many old men are such. They can delight us by the hour if they are happy, or bore us by the day if they are not, with anecdote and incident and personal reminiscence—but I cannot. For some mysterious reason I was not made that way.

The past comes to me in momentary flashes, and even then as a sort of dim and misty vision. If I may put it so, I stand, as it were, upon the deck of my little life-bark as it sails away into the mysterious unknown, and as I glance backward the headlands of the country that I am leaving are distinctly in view. Perhaps I see a tall spire in the distance, maybe a mountain-peak standing solitary and solemn above a vanishing world—but memory fails to take in the details. One by one they may be called up, but it is by an effort; in general they are fused together as one whole.

The principal interest that I take in my past is in the fact that it gave birth to my present—that through it runs the path along which God conducted me out of it, leading me ever onward to something higher and better. How wonderful and solemn is the life-journey of even the humblest of God's people. Mine, I know, was directed by an unseen hand and a gracious will—leading me, a valetudinarian, from my youth, through hardships untold, through struggles difficult now to conceive, through storms and floods and fiery trials, through sins and sorrows, but also through great mercies and unspeakable joys. I have been blessed, richly blessed, in my family. I have had the sympathy, encouragement and love of a vast circle of brethren, many of whom still have a place for me in their hearts and a gracious remembrance of me in their prayers. More than all, God has been with me and loved me. In my darkest hours his face has shone upon me; in my deepest distresses he has supported me. And so through evil and through good, through cloud and through sunshine, as He saw was really best for me, I have been brought to this good hour, to see the close of the world's greatest century, and trusting, if it shall please him, to see the opening of its brightest and best.

It will be understood, then, that what I particularly care for now, is not to live my past over again in memory and reflection. It is rather what I have brought out of it; the results that remain with me, the things that are mine, that are a part of my very self; things that I shall want on the other shore; things that God is thinking about; that interest the angels; that lead me into highest fellowship. Of course there are other subjects of interest and value, some of them of great present value; but as these are in the main connected with passing phases of our earthly life and work, they must be considered subsidiary in importance and not certainly of eternal interest. Possibly the subjects I have selected are too recondite and difficult for the pen of a feeble and garrulous old man. The thinking is likely to be wholly inadequate to the subject matter and the writing very crude and dull, but in any event such of my readers as may choose to follow me will be able to see, not indeed what exclusively interests, but What Most Interests Me Now.

Battle-Scarred.

When Thou hast called Thy children home,
  And to Thy presence Lord I come,
Shall I be banished from Thy sight—
  Because the vesture, whole and white,
Thou once did clothe my spirit in
  I bring all torn and soiled with sin?

I may not stand with those, I know,
  Who come back to Thee "white as snow,"
Who bear no scars, no bloody stain,
  From fierce onslaughts of Passion slain,
At last, perhaps, but not till spent,
  The wounded spirit earthward bent,
Nor ever felt the clutch of Hell,
  And, struggling to unloose it, fell;

But hast thou not some place in heaven
  For those who all life-long have striven,
Whose soiled, rent robes smell of the mire,
  But tell, too, of the conflict dire,
The tears, the prayers, the struggle—all
  That went before the fatal fall?

If in Thy rich and boundless grace
  Thou hast prepared with Thee a place
For those whose strength was ne'er assailed,
  O, wilt Thou turn aside Thy face
From those who bravely fought but failed?

—Tom F. McBeath in Alkahest.

A man may be oppressed by his sins, and hardly know what it is that oppresses him. There is more of sin in our burdens than we are ourselves aware of. It needs not that we should have committed any grievous fault. Do we recognize in ourselves that which needs to be set right, that of which we ought to be ashamed? Something which—were we lifted above all worldly anxieties—would yet keep us uneasy, dissatisfied—take the essential gladness out of the sunlight, make the fair face of the earth indifferent to us? a trustful glance, a discomposing look, and death, a darkness? To the man who feels this, whatever he may have done, or left undone, he is not so far from the kingdom of heaven but that he may enter thereinto, if he will.—George MacDonald.

Is Preaching an Art?

W. T. Moore.

Will the press ever supersede the pulpit? This question, like Banquo's ghost, will not down. It recurs again and again with respect to the position the pulpit is to occupy in the coming days. In answering the question properly, we must take into consideration the real facts of the case. Much depends. If in the future, preaching occupies its normal place, and at the same time fills that place wisely and well,no one need be concerned about preaching's losing power or retiring to make room for the mission of the press. These are in no way opposed to each other; they are rather co-ordinates, and ought to be mutually helpful.

It is unquestionably true that just now preaching is in great danger of losing power. The reason for this is not far to seek. For the most part, preaching is now regarded as an art, and nothing more. While perhaps a very few would affirm what is involved in this statement, at the same time there can be no questioning the fact that practically the statement is perfectly true. The result is, preachers are being manufactured continually as articles of merchandise are, and sometimes these manufactured preachers are sold in the public market, very much in the same style as wooden machinery is sold for agricultural and other purposes. And it is worth while to remark that many of these preachers are almost as wooden as the machinery to which attention has been called.

These manufactured preachers may be properly divided into three classes as follows: first, wooden; second, iron; and third milk-sop. The wooden preacher is easily manufactured. He lends himself readily to the college influences where he is educated. He is susceptible to the influences of the plane, saw and chisel of the professor who is his teacher. When he leaves college he simply reproduces the thought, and generally much of the manner, of the man from whom he has received the instruction. He has no originality either in matter or manner, but is scrupulous with regard to all rules and regulations in both exegesis and elocution. But he is, after all, simply a wooden man, manufactured according to a certain college cult; and as such he can never become a flaming power in the pulpit. His ministration may be respectable, his utterances may be highly proper, his language may be even chaste and orderly, but he will lack the fire, the audacious independence, the daring originality and the irresistible enthusiasm which marks the real preacher, as contradistinguished from one who is simply manufactured.

The iron preacher is not so easily made. He is not susceptible to the influences of the school-room. It is difficult to do anything with him or make anything out of him. He has a mind of his own. But when he is once manufactured he neither grows nor changes. He strikes twelve the first year of his public ministry. He never improves on his sermon. He illustrates the doctrine, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be." Wherever he goes he preaches practically the same sermon. He never has a fresh thing to say and even the old things all have a metallic ring. This ring soon wears out the audience, and consequently the preacher is compelled to move on or else preach to empty benches. His social life, his ruling in matters of discipline, his whole touch with the public are all as hard as the metal out of which he is made. He wonders why people do not love him. He feels sure his preaching is according to rule, he feels equally sure that his interpretations of scripture are quite in harmony with the laws of hermeneutics. Nevertheless his preaching soon ceases to be attractive even if it had some power to hold an audience when he first began his pastorate.

The milk-sop preacher is of a very different kind. He is pliable. He is easily made and unmade. He is not exactly inconsistent. This would be a great relief from the monotony of becoming all things to all men that by all means he may be nothing. Indeed, inconsistency is sometimes a high mark of genius. Whoever wishes to square his life to-day exactly by what it was yesterday is sure to make very little progress. Progress is itself a protest against what is usually understood by consistency. Yesterday is a great tyrant, when it seeks, by imperious rule, to govern to-day. We ought to be very different to-day from what we were yesterday; and every preacher ought to use the past only as a sort of background for the present—a kind of historical index finger pointing out certain experiences which ought to be helpful in shaping the present and future.

What, then, is the conclusion at which we arrive with respect to the question propounded at the beginning of this article? Undoubtedly preaching is an art, but it is much more than an art. The real preacher, like the poet, is born, not made. He cannot be suddenly jerked into shape by a theological professor, though this professor may polish and develop the real preacher that is beneath the uncultured, rough exterior of the college student. From this point of view, our training colleges and schools are most important and indispensable. Still it is true that all the training that can possibly be obtained cannot make a preacher in the best sense without the preacher-material with which to work. There must be that something more than art, to which I have already referred, before it is possible to develop the true preacher.

This brings me to notice the best practical way by which to secure a well educated and strong ministry. Is it not true that our churches have too little to do with the selection of the men who are preparing for ministerial work? At present, it often happens that a young man goes off to college and begins study, with the view to become a preacher of the gospel, when the church to which he belongs really knows nothing about his purpose, and certainly has taken no step either for or against the matter under consideration. Is this as it should be? It certainly does not lead to the best results.

A better way would be for the church to be consulted. If the young man has shown some fitness for the position to which he aspires, his church ought to be able to recognize the fact, and it ought to encourage him in his noble aspirations. This plan would give the young man the support of his church, both in their prayers and otherwise, during his college life; and this ought to be of great value to him in giving him courage and in helping him to understand the responsibilities of the work for which he is preparing himself.

Another point would be gained by the suggestion I have made. It is probable that very few wooden, iron or milk-sop men would be selected. No doubt some who now enter the ministry merely as a profession and who seek a place, as soon as their college course is ended, where they will receive the largest salary, would be remanded to a back seat. But the ministry as a whole would be all the stronger if this were the case. This is precisely one of the things most needed. We must get rid of professional men before we can have all real preachers. When our churches shall feel the responsibility of selecting the right kind of young men for the work of the ministry, more than half the evils referred to will quickly vanish.

The Joy of Trust: An Illustration.

W. H. Kern.

As the years flit by, as the preacher of the gospel listens to the stories of men, men whose heads are hoary with age, as they relate their experiences, occasionally a very interesting character comes before him, one that causes him to increase his faith and thank God for his unspeakable gift.

Not long since, while the writer was engaged in a series of meetings in one of the little towns of Illinois, while he was all alone in his apartments busy thinking over the sermon for the evening service, a gentle tap was heard against the door. On opening it there stood a stranger, an old man with a pleasant countenance, who had come to talk with me. He told me the story of his life, and I learned afterwards it was true. It was a wonderful career; he had been successful in the professional world; he had prospered as a business man; at the age of sixty-two he had, through a business venture, lost all, and now, at sixty-six, after struggling four years alone in the world, his sainted wife having crossed the "river" to her reward, he found that no man would hire him for anything. "But," said he, "I am as young in faith as I ever was. Indeed, I trust my Redeemer as never before, and I know he has something somewhere for me to do, so I have plans and am going to carry them out." As the old soldier said this his eye moistened, his face glowed with hope. After he had taken his departure I was led to meditate, and asked myself the following questions: 1. Why is this man without a place he can call by that sweet term home? Is he to blame altogether or is our form of civilization partly responsible? Should we foster the so-called "sharp" trader who, because he was an adept in driving a bargain, is to-day sitting serenely behind his large bank account in his palace in Chicago enjoying life, as the phrase goes, while this man wanders from place to place in search of something to do? 2. If death ends all what is there for this man now or in the years of his life here yet to come? Certainly nothing. The best and wisest thing for him to do would be to "end all" at once. 3. But what made him serene, hopeful, contented and even happy? Ah! it was that abiding faith in God he was exercising every day; the fact that he had a Redeemer, an elder Brother was with him by day and by night, whose providence he believed to be over him. What joy there is in the thought that Christ cares for even the least of his brethren, even the poorest of the poor, if only he will come to him in the purity of a sanctified life. How comforting to know that "Jesus is the same yesterday, to-day and forever," that "he liveth and abideth forever."

Did it ever occur to you, dear friend, that there are thousands of such cases as I have described, and that there are more people trusting the Lord to-day than ever before? Oh, the hearts that are filled with the sunshine of an ever increasing hope because of their trust in him who liveth evermore! How much is Christ worth to the race to-day? All else may fail, but he never. Men may prove false, but Christ is true always. We may be stripped of riches, position, influence, vocation, friends, health. The man of God may stand at the age of fifty, sixty or seventy, having given all his talents and energies to the proclamation of the word, without a place to lay his head. Yet he may be the happiest of all men, only waiting for his eternal reward.

Kansas City Letter.

It is too bad to stop a criticism and to blight a budding reputation for heresy, but truth sometimes demands it. The sensational report appearing in a secular paper, and passed on without any attempt at inquiry to the pages of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST by some of our good brethren, was wholly without justification in fact. The report stated that the pastors' alliance of Kansas City had discarded the prayer-meeting and good brethren rush straightway into print with homilies in defense of prayer! What the alliance did—if the prosaic and mild truth be told—was to appoint a committee to devise ways and means by which the influence of the prayer-meeting be both deepened and widened. By what optical trick the correction over the signature of W. F. Richardson was not discovered by our amiable critics does not appear. Is it not strange that brethren should be so quick, without making any endeavor to obtain the facts in the case, to criticise, and to their disparagement, their fellow-workers? The writer makes no claim for himself but feels that the reputations of such men as Haley, Richardson and Cave should put them beyond all reach of such hasty criticism. Brothers of the quill, it is always well to expend two cents in an endeavor to ascertain facts before venturing upon personal criticisms. But let this pass. The whole matter seems to be too ridiculous to have ever been given any serious attention. And to all our own estimable, though ill-informed censors, goodwill and the greetings of the new century.

And now a word as to the prayer-meeting. What this scribe stated in interview and to his people, and states here, is that, in his judgment, this service, speaking broadly, is far from being a success, that it lacks juice, practicalness and is not exerting the large influence it should. We are reaching only that class that least needs its ministrations. The saints are there and have profit there, but the sinners, Christian sinners if you please, do not come. We reach only the best; we should reach the worst. We minister to the strongest; we should minister to the babes in Christ. Now all this it may be suspected has little of novelty. Yet, though commonly recognized, it is a truth demanding careful consideration. The prayer-meeting problem is upon us and solve it we should. Would it not be well for all those whose prayer-meetings have been notable successes and at which over 50 per cent. of the membership has been present to tell us their secret?

The meeting of the preachers of the city and vicinity on the first Friday in the month in the parlors of the First Church was largely attended and a good program presented. At the "book conference" among the books recently read by various members of the alliance and recommended as worthy of study were Gilbert's "Revelation of Jesus," Gail Hamilton's "Washington Bible Class," Byer's "American Commonwealth," Lorimer's "Nineteenth Century," "China's Only Hope," by a Chinese Viceroy, etc. Among works of fiction, "Janice Meredith," "The Gentleman from Indiana," "Hugh Wynne," "The Master Christian." This fiction list shows that our preachers are heeding Emerson's injunction not to read a book until it is at least a year old. The paper of the morning by Pastor White, on "The First Disciples of Jesus," was practical, suggestive of fine quality throughout.

Kansas City ushered out the old and ushered in the new century in dramatically contrasting ways. Ten thousand gathered in Convention Hall to witness "The Century Ball" and the papers all joined in the proud and self-satisfying conclusion that from a standpoint of color, beauty, picturesqueness, this ball with its unique accessories and magnificent setting was the greatest, most spectacular, ever given in the new world! At the same hour in one of our central churches a more serious and a more thoughtful audience gathered to greet the new century with praise and prayer. A number of appropriate addresses were made, W. F. Richardson's being one of the strongest, and with prayer and the swelling Hallelujah chorus the twentieth century was ushered in.

Shall we have every preacher in the state at our next missionary convention? We have 753. What a mighty host. A resolution introduced by T. P. Haley at the recent meeting of the alliance looks towards securing the attendance of all these. Churches whose ministers are not financially able to attend should defray their expenses. The money will be well expended bringing back largest returns.

And speaking of the convention to come suggests that the time for our offering for State Missions is upon us. Have you taken it? Are you waiting for another pleading letter from our secretary? Get this offering out of the way. March is not far away and we shall have Foreign Missions to the front. But during the month of January let Missouri Disciples bring State Missions to the front—way to the front.

GEORGE H. COMBS.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The issue of The Outlook for December 1 contained the opinions of James Bryce, Henry Van Dyke, Arthur T. Hadley, T. W. Higginson, W. De Witt Hyde, Edward Everett Hale, George A. Gordon, A. M. Fairbairn, William J. Tucker and G. Stanley Hall, as to the greatest books of the century. Each of the writers names Darwin's Origin of Species. This is a remarkable fact.

Mr. Bryce says: "The book which I put first, and which probably everybody would put at least among the first, is Darwin's Origin of Species, a treatise which has done more to turn the current of speculative thought in general, as well as to cast light on the most difficult problems of natural history, than any other within the last hundred years." Edward Everett Hale says: "I like to remember that I bought the Origin of Species in the first edition in London, in 1859. I knew as well then as I know now that the book ought to be written, and it has rightly achieved its own reputation." Henry Van Dyke places the Origin of Species ninth in his list and says: "It gave lucidity and coherence to the conception of a progressive and continuous creation, which has changed the face of the modern scientific world." George A. Gordon says: "Darwin's Origin of Species, as achieving a revolution of human opinion on its subject, and as preparing the way for a new conception of the physical advent of man" deserves to be mentioned as one of the most influential books of the century. Arthur T. Hadley says that "the books chosen must be selected for their results rather than for their merits," and then after naming ten books says: "The absolutely sure names in this list are Goethe and Darwin." A. M. Fairbairn says: "An influential book is not necessarily great; it may be little more than timely." Concerning Darwin's Origin of Species he says: "The supremacy of this book no one can question; it stands in its own order alone, a book immediately influential and worthy of all the honor which has ever been paid to it." G. Stanley Hall says: "I should place first Darwin's Origin of Species, which in a way implied his later Descent of Man, because the whole revolutionary movement took its rise from these more than from any others." W. De Witt Hyde mentions Darwin's Origin of Species as one of the most influential books of the century and says: "It banished special creation and enthroned immanent reason supreme throughout the cosmic process." William J. Tucker names the Origin of Species, but does not characterize it, nor any book in his list. Thomas Wentworth Higginson says, concerning authors whose work belongs to the second half of the nineteenth century: "Darwin, of course, leads all others."

This, I repeat, is a remarkable fact—remarkable that the ten distinguished gentlemen above named should, without conference, designate this work as one of the ten great books of the nineteenth century. The doctrine of evolution was destined to enter the department of theology and influence that science. Lyman Abbott delivered before the Lowell Institute of Boston a course of lectures on "The Evolution of Christianity." The book containing these lectures came from the press seven or eight years ago.

President F. M. Bruner replied to the positions and arguments of Dr. Abbott. His reply makes a volume of 227 pages. This is one of the books that ought to be read by those who expect to participate in the discussion of the doctrine of evolution in its relation to the science of theology in the approaching Congress of Disciples. It can be obtained from Mrs. D. F. Givens, 2447 Columbine St., Denver, Col.

President Bruner rejected the position of the evolutionists in toto. He believed that the tendency of their teaching is to destroy the Christian faith. Bro. Bruner entered into rest in 1899. One who knew him well said, at the time of his death, that "it is neither exaggeration nor beyond moderation to state that his scholarship, in depth, breadth, and symmetry, equaled that attained by any man in the brotherhood." He was of German descent. He was a laborious, conscientious, earnest man. The last five years of his life were spent in a furnace of pain. His reply to Dr. Abbott was written when he was on his death bed. It is almost desperate in its earnestness. He felt that he was preparing his last message. Sometimes he feared that he would not live to complete it. He wrote and revised; every sentence was measured and weighed. Three times was the book written. Every superfluous word was stricken out. Condensation was studied. The strength of President Bruner's book is its weakness. He was a student and a thinker. He assumed that his brethren were also students and thinkers. With this conception he did his work. He fancied that the more he condensed the more likely would his work be read and appreciated. In this he was in error. If he had made a book of 500 pages, putting his thoughts in the form of modern fiction, the work would have been read by many who will pay no attention to it as it now is. Readers desire dilution, not condensation. See the popular books. The gifted author of this reply could have written a novel. He possessed dramatic talent. He had imagination. Now and again he dropped into poetry, but he was too desperately in earnest when he wrote this book to indulge in poetry or to make a display of his dramatic talent. He was a dying man engaged in the preparation of his last message to the world.

If you think it worth while to read this book you will doubtless feel that the author misrepresents Dr. Abbott. He writes as if Abbott were an atheist—which, of course, he is not. There are reasons for charging him with Pantheism, but none for calling him an atheist. President Bruner knew as well as we know that Lyman Abbott was not an atheist; but he believed that the tendency of the book, "The Evolution of Christianity," was atheistic. Bear this in mind as you read.

The courage of F. M. Bruner excites my admiration. Evolution, in one form or another, is almost universally accepted as true. See the first part of this letter. Look at the current literature where it touches, even incidentally, on this subject. But here is a man—one in a million—who dares to stand in the face of the world and say with a quiet, earnest dignity: "Gentlemen, you are in error. The tendency of your teaching is perilous." Such independence and courage are seldom seen.

Denver, Col.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis:

One of the most interesting denominational changes among the ministers of New York is that of Dr. S. P. Cadman (Methodist), pastor of the Metropolitan Temple, who has accepted a call to become pastor of the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn—the church whose pulpit was made vacant by the recent death of Dr. J. A. F. Behrends. Dr. Cadman has become one of the most conspicuous Methodist ministers in the city and country, through his great success in building up so rapidly the downtown church on Seventh Ave. below 14th Street. When he took charge of that work six years ago it was much depleted and many thought doomed to death; but he laid hold upon the situation with a vigorous hand, employing "institutional church" methods. A meeting of some kind was held in the building every night, classes were formed in certain branches of study, entertainments, lectures, musicales, debates, sociables and such like were the order week after week. The attendance became large, and the membership of the church increased with astonishing rapidity. Dr. Cadman has proven himself an able executive as he has also demonstrated his ability in the pulpit and on the platform. No doubt he will prove himself a worthy successor to Drs. Scudder and Behrends, noted pastors of the Central Congregational Church of Brooklyn. This change, as many others that might be recited, is evidence of a strong tendency toward religious independency. The power of the religious boss—Pope, Archbishop, Bishop, Priest, et al—like that of the political autocrat is passing.

The Rev. Dr. Robert S. MacArthur, pastor of Calvary Baptist Church, the largest of that denomination in the city, is preaching a timely series of sermons on "The Ethnic Masters and the Divine Master." I say timely, because perhaps there never has been a period in the world's history like ours in that the attention of all the great nations is directed to conditions and questions of the Orient where most of the dominant ethnic religions arose and where they wield their mighty influence. In speaking of Confucius Dr. MacArthur said, "No man except the writers in the Bible has ever influenced so many of his fellowmen. In this respect he stands alone among all the great writers and thinkers of the human race, swaying a scepter over nearly one-third of the human family, crowned by them as king in the vast realms of politics, ethics and religion. His life and work are well worth studying. He did not claim to be divine—only a man of lofty attainments. But Jesus was the divine Son of God. Confucius recognized the existence of sin in himself and in others; Jesus Christ was sinless. Confucius died and was buried; Christ died and was buried, but he arose again. Right here is the great impassible gulf between the ethnic master and the Divine Master. Christ makes saints out of sinners and heaven out of earth. But not so where the teachings of Confucius prevail."

Certain of the daily papers in New York are conducting a popular voting contest for mayor, in order to ascertain who public opinion has settled upon as the natural leader. A long list of candidates has been nominated, but no one has received as much as one-sixth of all the votes cast. The highest number, however, up to the present favors the election of Seth Low, president of Columbia College. One fact brought out in the balloting is that the people are not selecting any professional politician to fill the office of mayor. They express preference for able lawyers, merchants, college men and bankers. The tendency of popular opinion seems to point toward men of clean record and executive ability. The whole scheme is educational, and will help, it is believed, to put the city government on a basis altogether free from the entanglements of party politics. Municipal affairs should be wholly independent of politics and of politicians. Such conditions will help forward, as nothing else can, the cause of morality and religion in the great centers of population.

In connection with the foregoing it is proper to urge upon all preachers the importance of attending the congress of the Disciples at Lexington, Ky., March 26-28. The one theme of city evangelization alone ought to be sufficient to attract our attention to this meeting. Especially should all our ministers from the eastern cities make it a point to attend. I propose that we meet at Washington and leave there together over the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Monday afternoon, March 25, and have en route a conference on our eastern work—discussing especially the plans and purposes of the Atlantic States Conference to be held in May and the Bethany Beach Assembly for July and August. Let's hear from the eastern men going to the congress at Lexington. Let us go together and have fellowship by the way.

God is more to me than the whole world of men and women! When my Maker puts joy in my heart, shall I not be glad? When he calls my name shall I not answer? He is my right hand, I shall not be moved.—George MacDonald.

Gov't Lunches.

Eminent Doctor Orders Grape-Nuts.

An old physician in Washington, D. C., comments on the general practice government employes have of taking with them for luncheon buttered rolls and a variety of non-nutritious articles of food which they bolt down and go on with their work.

Ultimately dyspepsia and gastric trouble ensue, and in all such cases where he has been called in for consultation, the orders have been to abandon all sorts of food for the noon-day lunch except Grape-Nuts, which is a ready-cooked, predigested food and a concentrated form of nourishment.

This is eaten with a little fresh milk or cream which can be secured from the vendors who pass through the buildings during the noon hour. The doctor says: "For many reasons I would prefer not to have my name used publicly. Do not object to your furnishing same to any honest inquirer. I have been prescribing Grape-Nuts in numerous cases for about a year and a half and am pleased to say my patients have reason to be thoroughly satisfied with the results. I am myself a strong believer in Grape-Nuts and shall continue to be so long as the preparation gives the results I have obtained thus far." The doctor's name can be had of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Current Literature.

Among the numerous lives of Christ which have been written during the last quarter of a century that by R. W. Farrar, D. D., F. R. S., ranks high both for the scholarship which it indicates and the popular style in which it is written. This same author, in his more recent work, The Life of Lives (New York, Dodd, Mead & Co., 1900), has given us some "further studies in the Life of Christ," which we doubt not will meet with a like favorable reception from the reading public. It is not the purpose of this last work to deal primarily with the external facts in the life of Christ, which was done in his previous work, but rather with "questions of high importance, which the Gospels suggest," and it aims at "deepening the faith and brightening the hope in Christ of all who read it honestly." There is the same evidence here of accurate scholarship and of wide reading that we have in the author's former work. Some of the topics discussed are, "The Divine Birth;" "The Unique Supremacy of Jesus;" "The Testimony of Skeptics and Free Inquirers;" "The Gospels;" "The Condition of the World;" "The State of Religion in Palestine;" "The Messianic Hope;" "Christ's Method of Evangelization;" "The Uniqueness of Christ's Teaching;" "Christ's Condemnation of Pharisaic Religionism," etc. Each chapter, of which there are forty-three, illuminates the subject it treats. No writer after whom we have ever read has given us such a vivid picture of religion among the Jews at the time of Christ as Dr. Farrar. It is refreshing to see his stalwart blows against the extreme High Church tendencies in his own ecclesiastical fold, as well as against the pretensions of Rome. Dr. Farrar is an intense Protestant and on the deity and lordship of Jesus Christ he is thoroughly evangelical. The book is one of many evidences manifest in our times of the desire and effort to get back to Christ's view of God and of the world and of man's relations to God and to his fellowman, and is a worthy contribution and tribute to the Christianity of Christ.

The last volume to appear in the series of Ten Epochs of Church History is The Reformation, by Williston Walker. The plan of the series has placed upon the author's work some limitations which make his task easier of performance than the writing of an independent treatise on so important a period of history, for it absolves him from the obligation to treat in extenso either the causes or the consequences of the movement which is his main theme. A separate volume is devoted to the English Reformation and Professor Walker is thereby spared another difficult task—perhaps the most difficult of all in connection with a history of the Protestant Reformation. Yet in spite of the fact that other writers in the series have treated of the preceding period including the preparations for the reformation, the author devotes a long introductory chapter to a general survey of this field, including the work of the Mystics, the breaking up of Scholasticism, the formation of the modern nations, the labors of Wyclif and Huss, the revival of learning, the Reforming Councils and the development of individualism. In this broad treatment of large subjects he exhibits considerable skill in rapid narration and in generalization, without allowing his history to become either vaguely general or too heavy with the weight of details. The devotion of an entire chapter to the "Spanish Awakening" in the fifteenth century, including the consolidation of the Spanish nation under Ferdinand and Isabella and the reform of the church in Spain under Cardinal Ximines, while only one chapter is given to all the preparatory movements just named, must be explained rather by the author's desire to give emphasis to an important movement generally little dwelt upon in the histories of the Reformation (and having indeed little direct effect on the Reformation) than as representing a deliberate judgment as to historical perspective. One is glad to notice that the story of Reuchlin and his influence in precipitating the crisis in Germany is told more fully than is usual in brief histories. The narrative of the inner spiritual development and external history of Luther, Zwingli and Calvin proceeds in a straightforward style without unnecessary subtlety or complication. A chapter is given to the Catholic Counter-Reformation including the organization of the Jesuit Order and the Council of Trent, but the author apparently does not consider it within his limits to treat at length of the after-struggle upon which the fate of Protestantism depended. So far as the reviewer can see, the author makes no original contribution to his subject, but he draws his information from reliable sources and writes a convenient, well-arranged and useful volume.

As this is, we believe, the last of the ten volumes of this series to make its appearance, it may be worth while to remark that, as a whole, the series is worthy of commendation as reliable and useful for the general reader. The student will, in most cases, prefer to use more original and first-hand authorities, but it is a matter worthy of note that a series such as this should have succeeded to such an extent in maintaining so high a standard. It is the bane of series publications, whether histories or commentaries, that a few good volumes are relied upon to sell the whole. It is not so here. The volume on The Great Western Schism is perhaps the least satisfactory of all and those by Vernon Bartlett on The Apostolic Age, by Paul Van Dyke on the Renaissance and the one at present under review are among the best. (Scribner's $2.00.)

Interest in the study of the lives of great Americans should be stimulated by the attractive series of little biographies now being published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Volumes on Franklin, Jackson and Eads have already appeared and Jefferson, Cooper, Penn, Grant, and Lewis and Clark will appear during the winter and spring. The books are convenient and cheap.

By an oversight we failed to state in reviewing "The Anglo-American Alliance in Prophecy," in our issue of Jan. 3, that its author is Bro. Martin L. Streator who was for many years in the employ of the C. W. B. M. as a general evangelist in the West. His production of so elaborate a book on this recondite subject will be a surprise to many who knew him only as an evangelist.

The same motive of anti-Russian feeling which prompted Kipling's gruesome poem, "The Bear That Walks Like a Man," is exhibited in a piece of recent fiction, The Half-Hearted, by John Buchan, one of the younger English writers. The story deals with the attempted conquest of India by Russia and its failure through the vigor of one Englishman in spite of the lack of governmental vigilance (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

The publishers of "The Reign of Law" are circulating a printed statement calling attention to the praise which that book has received at the hands of certain well-known Unitarian ministers and contrasting that with the "somewhat violent handling which has been accorded to the hero of the story and its author by the Brothers of Christ, the sect to which the novelist affiliates the hero of the story." The publishers have evidently gotten all they know about the Disciples of Christ by hearsay, and at long range at that.

The Canadian migration into New England has produced some curious and interesting social results. It was this material, as well as the French Canadians in Canada, that was dealt with in the stories and essays of Rowland Evans Robinson, who recently died. His sympathies were so fine and generous and his ear so accurately attuned that, though totally blind, his nature-books are worthy to be compared with those of John Burroughs. His latest book, "Sam's Boy," a story of Vermont, is now in course of publication.

Parliamentary Rules Made Easy, by Mrs. Emma Lard Longan, does what its title promises. It originates no new rules but, being founded upon the standard manuals, states clearly and simply under convenient arrangement those principles and rules which govern parliamentary assemblies. The use of the feminine pronoun throughout—as when, in speaking of the chairman, it says: "She votes when there is a tie"—is probably not intended to limit the use of the book to feminine assemblies, but to get even with the male sex for the common use of "he," without respect to gender. (Hailman & Co., Kansas City. $.50.)

William Elliott Griffis, who has written many good books about Holland and many more equally good about Japan, finds a congenial subject to the treatment of which he is admirably adapted in writing the biography of the great Dutch missionary, Verbeck of Japan. Dr. Verbeck, a Hollander by birth and a representative of the Dutch Reformed Church, spent nearly forty years in Japan. Not only was his residence there contemporary with the transformation of that land from a hermit nation to a modern nation, but his own efforts were in a large measure influential in bringing about this change. Although a modest and retiring missionary, he received a larger measure of appreciation for his work than falls to the lot of many, for the Mikado himself recognized and rewarded his services and, upon his death, three years ago, he was buried with pomp at the expense of the state. The story of his life is the story of the awakening of Japan. (Revell. $1.25.)

Three dainty little volumes of the year-book variety are Daily Food, Daily Comfort and Daily Promises. They are a little larger than your thumb nail and a little smaller than a pocket note-book, daintily bound in white and gold, and contain verses of Scripture for each day in the year. (Revell, $.25 each.) An eloquent arraignment of war is found in an address by Ernest H. Crosby, entitled War from a Christian Point of View, published in a pamphlet. It luridly depicts the horrors of war but, since it makes no specific statement upon this point which any civilized person ever denied and makes no argument against the counter-proposition that, bad as war is, there are some things worse and that Christian nations are therefore justified in going to war to avoid the worse things, it cannot be considered convincing except to those already convinced. A little volume of Selections from George MacDonald bears the sub-title, Helps for Weary Souls. It contains many strong and spiritual utterances from the pen of one who always strengthens and comforts. (Dusenberry. Chicago. $.50.)

The unpretentious little Alkahest, "a literary magazine of the South," exhibits more good taste and first-hand literary merit than many of its more gaudy and assertive contemporaries. We take the liberty of reprinting a poem from it this week.

Travel is an English magazine, devoted to the interests of people who make tours for health and pleasure. Its December number, which is fairly typical, contains an article on Rome, a story of a cycling tour in Norway—wherein I know from personal experience that the cyclists who made the tour missed the best that Norway has in store for wheelmen—a description of some rambles in Sicily and no end of general miscellany besides.

Our Budget.

—The new century starts off in a tidal wave of prayer sweeping over the continent.

—This is the preparation week for the great forward movement in evangelistic work among the churches of America.

—Enough prayers have been offered during the Week of Prayer, if they have been prayers of faith, to generate a revival of national not to say international dimensions. But the world is not to be saved by prayer alone.

—If the Week of Prayer shall grow into a Year of Prayer, and the churches will cooperate in preaching the gospel and in persuading its members to live the gospel, we shall witness such a revival as will purify and exalt our domestic, social, political and religious life and prove a blessing to the nation.

—We hope our friends who have written exceedingly kind and complimentary notices about the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in its new dress, will not regard it as any evidence of our lack of thorough appreciation of their kind words, if we fail to publish their letters. The demands on our space are such that we hardly feel justified at present in giving space to these complimentary remarks. We are none the less grateful for them, however.

—The St. Louis Protestant churches are beginning a revival work in this city under the leadership of Mr. Newell, assistant superintendent of the Moody Institute of Chicago. Meetings are to be held daily from 11 to 1 o'clock for prayer, and in the evening at the Coliseum evangelistic services will be held. The interest seems to be good and we sincerely hope that there may be a great awakening in this city. Our churches and ministers are co-operating in the movement. It takes a united effort to make much of an impression on St. Louis.

—We have had so many calls for "A Creed in Verse: What We Stand For," in some convenient form, that we have decided to print it in neat type on a card about the size of a postal, leaving the reverse side blank for use by ministers for announcement of special subjects, or such other use as they may desire to make of it. One Onio preacher orders a thousand copies. Others have made inquiry as to whether the poem will be put in some form for popular use. We will accommodate those who desire them by furnishing same in lots of one hundred, five hundred and a thousand, at prices which will about cover cost. See advertisement elsewhere.

—One of our contemporaries in speaking of the West Point hazing case, which is now being investigated by a congressional committee, expresses the opinion that our Republican institutions are in danger unless the committee shall so direct its inquiry as to secure a condemnation of the whole thing. We do not in the least believe in hazing, but we do hazard the opinion that a committee of investigation best performs its function when it directs its inquiry with a view to ascertaining the facts and not with a view to either condemning or acquitting.

—It is with great pleasure that we print this week the first article of the series of articles from Bro. J. S. Lamar, on "What Most Interests Me Now." This is a very happily chosen theme for summing up the chief net results of one's thinking and experiences through a long life. The "Introduction" which appears this week will serve as a foretaste of what our readers may expect in his treatment of this theme. We anticipate not only an exceedingly profitable series of articles, but a permanent contribution to religious literature. We bespeak for the articles which will appear in alternate numbers of the paper as nearly as possible, the careful perusal of our readers.

—We do not often publish compliments about ourselves, but the following carries its excuse upon its face: "Dear brethren:—I get my support from the Ministerial Board and have to go without luxuries except your paper. My wife reads to me as I am too blind to read. I was ninety-five years old yesterday. So long as I can spare a dollar I will take the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, as it is almost food and drink to me. THOMAS ABRAMS."

—In a word of hearty congratulation from Judge Barnum, of Denver, Col., to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, he makes a statement which we will be pardoned for printing because it rightly interprets the spirit of this paper: "The solidity of your whole work," he says, "is in the firmness and courtesy with which you have stood by and advocated that which you have believed to be right. There is something heroic in calmly waiting the vindication of history. Your waiting is done and your vindication is here." As this is a word of commendation for the paper which many hands and heads and hearts have contributed to make what it is we pass it along the line with this remark: The man who is content to await the vindication of history must always love truth more than popularity or material gain. Time will tell whether or not we have done that, or, if time does not, eternity will.

—Not infrequently—that is to say several times a week—we hear some preacher characterized as a "hustler," or a church wishes to have recommended to it a minister who can "hustle." We lay no special claim to being purists in the use of the English language, but that is one word which we do not like to hear applied to a preacher. The Standard Dictionary says that the word "hustle" signifies "to shuffle together in confusion, to push roughly or rudely, to move with difficulty," and its synonyms are to "crowd, elbow, hurry, jam, jostle, push, rush, strive, struggle." That is what you say about a preacher when you say that he is a "hustler." In some cases the usage may not be altogether inappropriate but certainly no church would deliberately search for that sort of man. And yet there are many churches which cannot understand that a man is energetic unless he jostles and jolts and elbows his neighbors, particularly his religious neighbors. Such a judgment is as intelligent as judging a horse by the amount of dust he kicks up, or a locomotive by the volume of its smoke and the loudness of its whistle. We need among both preachers and laymen not more hustling, but more calm, peaceful, purposeful and efficient activity.

—The Twentieth Century belongs to CONSCIENCE. Jesus comes to the head of the tribe, and the next business of our politics is CHARACTER. And in proclaiming that evangel, The New Voice, of worldwide publication, stands alone.—The New Voice.

The Voice should have added: "And they seek my life to destroy it!"

—The Wichita (Kan.) authorities are not able to cope with men who are violators of law in running an unlawful saloon, but when a woman steps in and smashes the goods without sanction of law, they are equal to the emergency, and promptly imprison her. Thus municipal governments measure themselves before the whole world.

—In an article in the Advance (Congregational) on "The Unity of the Church," various unifying tendencies and movements of the past century are noted and the following utterance is made about work of the Disciples of Christ:

"The origin and rapid growth within this century of the people known as 'Christians' or 'Disciples' is significant. It is not too much to say that the chief reason for the remarkable popularity of the 'Disciples' was their cry against sectarianism. 'Let us have done with divisive, human names applied to the church of Christ,' they said, 'such as Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational; let us go back to Christ, and be known simply as Christians or Disciples; let us revive primitive Christianity, and the Church will be unified and denominations will cease.' It is one of the humorous and pathetic features of this noble crusade, that, while protesting against sectarianism they have, themselves, become a sect, thus adding one more division to the Church, already too much divided. Nevertheless, we may appreciate the value of their testimony, and rest assured that the vital principle for which they contended is destined to have an increasing influence on the Christianity of the twentieth century."

Even some of ourselves have not been entirely blind to certain "features of this noble crusade" which have been too pathetic to be humorous, when some of us, pleading for the unity of God's children, have virtually excluded from the operation of divine grace those other sheep that are not of our fold. But these things have been merely passing incidents by which we will be less and less encumbered in this new century.

—The Interior (Presbyterian) is as far as possible from being a creed-bound paper. In fact it is an uncompromising advocate of revision and its venerable but irrepressible editor is a thorn in the flesh of the anti-re-revisionists and a source of boundless joy to his more liberal-minded brethren. The following fable from his pen makes its own application:

"The Chicago News published recently a picture of a meerschaum pipe 'upon which a (Catholic) missionary to Africa had spent 18 years of labor' according to his own report, the principal bas-relief which decorated the meerschaum being a reproduction of the Immaculate Conception of Murillo. Neither the 'missionary' nor the reporter seemed to find anything incongruous in such employment. But the comfort of it all is that even if the misguided 'missionary' wasted a good deal of time in making his pipe he did not require his converts, providing always there were any, to use it. The tendency with many an ecclesiastic is not only to needlessly consume time upon elaborate carvings of his particular creed, 'immaculate' on 'infallible,' but to insist that the whole church shall smoke it."

Hon. Champ Clark.

Champ Clark, whose picture constitutes our frontispiece this week, was born in Lawrenceburg, Anderson county, Ky., March 7, 1850. His mother's maiden name was Aletha Jane Beauchamp. On her mother's side she was descended from the Jetts and Robertsons. In youth Mr. Clark worked as a hired hand on a farm, clerked in a country store, taught school. He was educated in the common schools, Kentucky University, Bethany College and the Cincinnati Law School. He graduated from Bethany in 1873 in the largest class that ever graduated there and with the highest honors. The class contained several men who have risen to eminence. The youngest man in the class was Hon. J. F. Merryman, now of St. Louis. In 1873-4 Mr. Clark was president of Marshall College in West Virginia. In 1875 he located in Pike county, Mo., where he has practiced law ever since, excepting one year that he was principal of the Louisiana High School and another year that he was editor of the Louisiana Press. He has been city attorney at Louisiana and Bowling Green, assistant prosecuting attorney and prosecuting attorney of Pike county, presidential elector, special judge of the Louisiana court of common pleas, member of the legislature and four times elected to congress, being now close to the end of the third term. In December, 1881, he was married to Miss Genevieve Bennett, of Calloway county, Mo. Four children have been born to them—little Champ, Ann Hamilton, Bennett and Genevieve, two of whom, Bennett and Genevieve, survive. Mr. Clark never had any brothers and only two sisters, Margaret and Elizabeth; the former died in childhood and the other is the wife of the widely-known preacher and erstwhile office editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, J. J. Haley, of Cynthiana, Ky.

Mr. Clark, it is said, made a national reputation as an orator in a thirty minute speech at Tammany Hall, July 4, 1893. But that reputation has been not only maintained but increased by his subsequent service in congress, and by his popular lectures. He is described in one of the numerous press notices of him as "a big, manly fellow, brave as a warrior, and chuck full of humor. His wit flashes of electrify his hearers, his flights of eloquence enchant them, and his bursts of pathos stir their souls. No man ever so completely captured our people. On the lecture stage or in the field of politics he is a rising star. His familiarity with men and measures eminently qualify him. His devotion to friends and to duty insure an enthusiastic following. His sturdy honesty, his intrepid courage, his love for the masses, and his hatred of oppression, his ability and readiness to advocate, defend or denounce, his wide information on all public questions, make him one of the most useful men in congress. Whenever he addressed the House every seat on the floor was filled and the galleries were crowded. There were but four others who drew such crowds and received such profound attention. They were Reed, Cochran, Bryan and Allen." Mr. Clark's political career is not yet at an end. His friends believe that the senatorial toga would hang rather gracefully over his broad shoulders. His article elsewhere on "The Growth of Democracy," written for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, shows what an intense American he is.

Our Twentieth Century Endowment.

The achievements of the century that has just closed have been wonderful. Rapid strides have been made in invention, literature and art, but no advancement is more perceptible than that which we have made along educational and benevolent lines. The Church has been liberal in endowing our schools and in sending the gospel to heathen lands.

The progress in missionary work has been wonderful, and we may expect marvelous things during the coming years. We have not given too much to our colleges and to the different missionary enterprises of the Church, but we have devoted too little time to benevolent institutions.

The Christian Church Widows and Orphans' Home, of Louisville, Ky., stands as a monument to the untiring energy of God's consecrated disciples, some of whom have passed over the river and entered into their rest. Those of us that have the care of this sacred institution have not done as much for it during the past years as we would like to have done, but we have done the best we could. We appeal to the brotherhood of the Christian Church at the beginning of the new century to help us to endow this Home that is doing so much for the helpless little children whose lots have been cast in places not so pleasant as those in which some of us live. I appeal to every reader of this paper for a contribution to this worthy work. You will never miss the few dollars that you give in this life, but will receive a reward for it in the life to come.

Suppose these were your own little children, and the church would not properly care for them, you would feel that the gospel of our Savior had lost its power, and that the religion of Jesus Christ was a selfish religion.

The prospects for the Endowment are good. Quite a good deal has been given already, but we want to make one grand effort during this year to raise a Fifty Thousand Dollar Endowment to carry on this sacred and tender ministry. Will you help us? You might leave five thousand dollars in your will to this Home if you are not able to give something now. We are simply God's stewards. All that we have or ever expect to have depends upon God's mercy and his love. If you know of any brother or sister that is able to give, or that could leave something in their will, write and let us know, and I will gladly give them any information that they may desire in regard to the Home. We are not raising any Twentieth Century Fund for anything else, and why not bend every energy toward the accomplishment of the task which we have undertaken?

I desire to take this opportunity to thank our papers for the interest they have taken in this work, and to thank all of those that have assisted by sending us contributions. The children in the Home and all others connected with it appreciate every kindness that has been shown the Home. Send all contributions, etc., to Robt. H. Otter, President Executive Board, Box 300, Louisville, Ky.

A CREED IN VERSE:

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

J. F. Williams, of Fairmont, W. Va., writes that the church at that place is undertaking to build a suitable house of worship in a central location. It is a weak church in a growing city, and contributions of $1 or more for the new building are solicited from the brethren everywhere.

The Board of Church Extension has received another $1,000 on the annuity plan, on which it is to pay 5 per cent. The annuity fund of the Church Extension Board now amounts to $53,000.

The receipts for Foreign Missions during the first ten days of January amounted to $336.26, or about twice that of the corresponding period last year. Of this amount $100 was on the annuity plan.

J. N. Taylor has just closed three and a half years of successful work at Vevay, Ind., and has accepted a call to Madison. Their new house of worship at the latter place will be dedicated March 1.

The church at Muncie, Ind., is raising money to pay its debt by taking subscriptions for the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies' Home Journal. Any one who wishes these papers will confer a favor on the church by ordering through A. F. Stahl.

The Indianapolis Press of recent date announces the death of Nelson Sellars, an Indiana pioneer, an old citizen of Franklin, Ind., and father of Bro. W. T. Sellars. He was a prominent member of the Christian Church in his city and a liberal friend of Butler College.

The Brooklyn Eagle, a paper which prides itself upon publishing more sermons than any other daily paper in the country, prints at the length of nearly a column, a New Year's sermon on "The Bible as Authority," by M. E. Harlan, pastor of the Sterling Place Christian Church, Brooklyn.

E. J. Lampton, of Louisiana, Mo., says: "The Christian Church of this city has called Bro. A. F. Mayhall of Vandalia, Mo., to become its pastor and he has accepted the call. This was wise on the part of both church and preacher. The church is wholly free from debt and is living in peace and harmony."

Will our correspondents please be more careful to reveal their identity? We have a newspaper clipping showing that some church raised $3,158 last year, had a net gain of 23, and has a present membership of 714, and fine prospects for 1901. Since we have nothing to indicate what church it is, we might start a guessing contest.

W. H. Waggoner reports that his missionary institute work has prospered during the past year. He lectured 38 weeks in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri and Nebraska. He uses not only his famous missionary maps of his own construction, but a stereopticon with views of mission stations and mission work.

The Kansas Christian Ministerial Institute will meet in Herington, Kan., April 16-18. The president, David H. Shields, of Salina, writes that a strong program has been arranged and urges all Kansas preachers who are not members to send their names at once to W. S. Lowe or William Ireland, Topeka, or to M. Ingalls, Leanna.

S. W. Crutcher writes: "D. C. Barnett enters upon his seventeenth year as superintendent of the Sunday-school at Harrisonville, Mo. Twelve years ago this city with 1,500 inhabitants had five saloons. Now with 2,000 it has only two and neither of these is permitted on the public square. We had full houses and one addition last Lord's day."

The church at Greenfield, O., of which Clyde V. Callahan is pastor, dedicated its new house of worship on Jan. 6. It is a young and growing congregation, well located in a prosperous little city. The dedication services were conducted by S. H. Bartlett, and though the building is not quite free from debt, more money was raised than was asked for.

I. N. McCash received an ovation on his return to Des Moines after his prolonged sojourn in Europe. Our readers know of his long illness at the London Temperance Hospital and have been informed from time to time of his improvement. He was greeted by an immense audience at the University Place Church. The attendance at Sunday-school on that day was 917.

B. B. Burton has finished his work at San Jose, Cal., after a five years' pastorate. The church at that place was reluctant to let him go, but yielded to his own conviction of his duty. Resolutions of appreciation and regret were passed by the church and came to us signed by C. P. Crow, elder, and J. C. Wasson, clerk.

The W. C. T. U. will extend its work to some new fields during this year. Havana will be the starting point for an organization in Cuba. Societies have already been formed in the Philippines. A temperance crusade will be begun in Honolulu to arouse sentiment in favor of a prohibition bill for the Pacific isles. Mrs. Fields, who has for two years been working as an organizer in Mexico, will probably remain two or three years longer. Special attention is to be given this year to work in Oklahoma, Arizona and Indian Territory and to the Scandinavian population in North Dakota and the negroes in the South.

J. H. Hardin, pastor of the church at Liberty, Mo., is giving to his congregation a series of Wednesday evening lectures on the history of the Disciples of Christ. This idea, in harmony with our recent editorial on The Study of Our Pioneers and the plan of the Bethany C. E. Reading Course for this quarter, is highly commendable. The course has been widely advertised and is creating much interest.

The church at South Bend, Ind., of which P. J. Rice is pastor, raised $2,885.20 for all purposes during the past year, of which $632.55 was for missions. The church received on the annuity plan property worth $8,000 which will be used in erecting a new building. Forty members were added to the church during the year and fifty to other churches under the preaching of the pastor. The present membership is 466.

The Christian Tabernacle at Tyndall, S. D., was successfully dedicated on Sunday of last week in spite of weather which the local papers described as the worst day of the winter. The congregation was organized last August with 66 members as a result of a tent meeting. The property is said to be worth $2,500. Bro. Elliott organized the congregation and dedicated the building.

Dr. G. A. Miller, Cornell University, formerly Professor of Mathematics in Eureka College, has received a prize of $260 from the Royal Academy of Sciences, Cracow, Austria, for his investigations in the theory of substitution groups. This is the first instance in which a foreign academy has awarded its prize to an American for investigations in pure mathematics. In applied mathematics several such prizes had previously been awarded to American investigators. This indicates that even in pure science Americans are beginning to become leaders among the scientific men of the world.

THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—I am now stationed at the above named town, about 50 miles out of Manila. I beg space in your paper for a few words in regard to Christian work in this country. The field is white unto harvest. Almost all the denominations are represented. We have no man on the field yet. I wonder why it is that the denominations get ahead of us? The Filipinos are very glad to hear the true gospel. They accept it quickly and gladly. The natives as a whole are tired of Spanish rule, and would rather step out into the greater light which Protestantism brings than to tarry under the exacting and tyrannical rule of the Romish Church. The language is easily learned. I myself would prepare for the work and remain here indefinitely, but my eyes are affected seriously. When one looks over the field and sees how badly the work is needed, it becomes appalling. The soldiers need the gospel also. The chaplains are scarce. Have had no religious services here for several months and it is on good lines of travel. It seems to be the delight of many soldiers to teach the Filipinos all the sins which they are not already acquainted with. Liquor and gambling, accompanied with brothels where convenient, are the greatest curse of the country. The Manila paper is practically a synonym for a lager beer advertisement. Liquor followed the flag of expansion; but if the flag of expansion means the widening of drunkards' grave yards, better the flag of expansion had never come to the Philippine Islands. "Come over and help us."

Very respectfully,

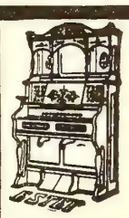
If some of my brethren who have means to spare could only realize the importance of such an enterprise they surely would not turn a deaf ear to our earnest appeal for means to invest in it. Only a few hundred dollars to inaugurate a work that would tell for good for all time and in eternity in the salvation of lost souls.



A city of 400,000 people without a single newspaper. Some one will start one, why not we? It will pay its way when put on foot. There is no doubt of this. Other enterprises require much means and a long time before becoming self-supporting. Here is an opportunity to open up a means of preaching Christ to the Chinese in a way new and effectual, and of reaching a people who cannot otherwise be reached. Give us a good press and plenty of type and we can do wonders. There is no doubt of it.

A few years ago when we asked for money for school apparatus, Bro. Atkinson of blessed memory agreed to give $100 if the balance be raised by others. In a short time a goodly amount was secured and there has been untold good accomplished by the use of the articles furnished. May we not hope that there are among the great brotherhood some who will see fit to go into this great business? I verily believe that money could not be more worthily invested. F. E. MEIGS.

ASTHMA CAN BE CURED.

Statement of a Noted Physician.

The astonishing statement that Asthma can be cured, coming from so well known an authority as Dr. Rudolph Schiffmann, will be of interest to sufferers from Asthma, Phthisic and Hay Fever. The Doctor's offer, coming as it does from a recognized authority, who during a practice of over 30 years has treated and cured more cases of Asthma and its kindred than any living doctor, is certainly a generous one and an innovation in this age of countless fraudulent nostrums. Believing that the honest way to sell a remedy is to let those who would buy convince themselves of its merits before purchasing, Dr. Schiffmann has authorized this paper to say that he will send a free trial package of his remedy, "Schiffmann's Asthma Cure," to any sufferer who sends his name on a postal card before March 10th. This remedy has cured thousands of cases that were considered incurable. Being used by inhalation it reaches the seat of the disease direct, stops the spasm instantly and insures sweet and refreshing sleep. A free trial package will convince the most skeptical. Those desiring to try a free sample should address Dr. R. Schiffmann, 259 Jackson St., St. Paul, Minn.

Sympathy

Is a good thing for the young husband to give the young wife. But sympathy will not abate one jot of her nervousness or lift her to that plane of sound health where alone the wife and mother can find happiness.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription meets every womanly want and need. It tranquilizes the nerves, restores the appetite and induces refreshing sleep. Its use previous to maternity makes the baby's advent practically painless and gives the mother abundant nutrition for her child. "Favorite Prescription" is a woman's medicine and has no equal as a cure for womanly diseases. It establishes regularity, dries weakening drains, heals inflammation and ulceration and cures female weakness.

Accept no substitute for "Favorite Prescription." No other medicine is "just as good" for weak and sick women.

"It affords me great pleasure to be able to say a few words in regard to the merits of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and 'Golden Medical Discovery,'" writes Mrs. Flora Arn, of Dallas, Jackson Co., Mo. "I was tempted to try these medicines after seeing the effect upon my mother. At an early age of married life I was greatly bothered with painful periods, also a troublesome drain which rendered me weak and unfit for work of any kind. I became so thin there was nothing left of me but skin and bone. My husband became alarmed and got me a bottle of 'Favorite Prescription. After he saw the wonderful effects of that one he got two more, and after I used those up there was no more pain, and I began to gain in flesh very rapidly."

This effort will be what carpet weavers would call "Hit and Miss," missing far more than it hits.

By one of those annoying changes of time which the traveler has to learn at his expense, the "Rambler" had a short lay-over at Boone, one of Iowa's important towns. Starting for the parsonage he met a pair of ponies Jehu-ed by the genial J. M. Hoffman, and was taken in and shown around.

The first point, of course, was the new church, now consisting of a $3,000 lot, finely located, close to the business center, and in one of the best residence sections, and an admirably constructed basement, 60x80 feet, which is expected to grow into a $10,000 house. This enterprise is very important, and as our people in Boone are weak, they must have help. Bro. Hoffman's whole soul is in it; he is likely to appear anywhere asking aid, and it ought to be very freely bestowed.

At Nevada, 23 miles east, one of Iowa's flourishing county seats, our people have just completed a neat little house of worship. Bro. Hoffman dedicated it and raised the last dollar of its cost. His wife ministers to them while he holds the larger fort at Boone.

At Ames, an important C. & N. W. R. R. junction point, where they have just expended $1,000,000 in improving and double tracking their road, and in a fine depot, our people are liberally distributed over the town and about the State Agricultural College, near by. In keeping with a spirit of enterprise, they contracted for a good list of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELISTS, though it amounted to somewhat less than the R. R. investment. Bro. and Sister J. R. McIntire are justly held in high esteem by their people.

The church at Albia deserves mention for substantial enterprise. Bro. Ingram took pleasure in showing the points of excellence of their fine new house, about completed and mostly paid for. This has come, not as necessary to the influence and growth of the church in a rapidly growing place, as at Boone, but like the improvements at Drake University, it was absolutely necessary to accommodate the enlarging proportions of the work.

We have a similar situation at Pleasantville, where the church is just completing the best house of worship in the county, but none too good for the congregation, which has been steadily advancing under the leadership of F. D. Ferrall.

But the most interesting situation is at Swan, a little hamlet of some 500 people, where about a year ago J. W. Babcock, a Drake student, engaged half time with a weak and discouraged church, held a meeting with 120 additions, and has just completed the transformation of the little old rectangle, of which hardly a reminder can be seen, into a really nice, commodious and modern house, and paid for it.

If you wish to study evolution—of something "up to date" from an old, dilapidated congregation and house of worship—consult J. W. Babcock.

These are only samples of many Iowa churches who have new buildings in various stages, and the annual report of the state Board showed 34 dedicated last year.

It would be pleasant to dwell at length on the marvelous growth of the church at Mason City. Bro. Sargent reports that plans are under consideration for the enlargement of their house—already a large one—which is becoming a stern necessity. Bro. Prussia, not content with covering the whole city with the Home Department of their Sunday-school, was enthusiastically planning to extend it into the country in all directions.

Sherman Hill made one signal failure—he tried to leave Hampton, but the unanimous sentiment of the people compelled him to unpack and settle down to resume the good work for which the Hampton church is well known.

Pity we can't talk about Bro. McKnight and his hosts at Oskaloosa, Bros. Misener and Sellards in their large field at Ottumwa, Bro. Moffett and the substantial people at Centerville, R. M. Dungan and the splendid church at Moulton, and so on around, but space forbids. I. N. McCash reached home Jan. 3, and occupied his pulpit at the University Church Jan. 6, with the great auditorium packed and a Sunday-school of more than 900. He is looking and feeling well, and thinks he will soon be in condition to do the best work of his life.—RAMBLER.

Concerning the Disciples of Christ.

The Bethany C. E. Reading Circle for January, February and March, will devote their attention to the study of our own principles and people. Why may we not have, in all our churches, Sunday-schools, Christian Endeavor Societies and Woman's Auxiliaries, a movement all along the line to revive "first principles?" Is it not strenuously needed?

In the general breaking up of creeds do not men need to have their attention called to the creed that needs no revision? In the decay of ecclesiasticism is there not a peril that men may fall into the meshes of false systems? In the cry for greater evangelism is there not a demand for emphasizing, as never before, the New Testament ordinances and law of pardon? Would not a simultaneous move on the part of all our forces, a re-statement by all our preachers and teachers, for the first quarter of the New Year and the first three months of the new century, of these vital things, bring great results?

Our old people are passing away. Our young men and women are coming to their places. How many of the rising generation can answer intelligently the question, "For what do you stand?" How many of the young people of the average congregation among us can give a clear statement of the origin and principles of the nineteenth century movement for the restoration of Apostolic Christianity? Let the preachers answer.

Now the Bethany Reading Courses provide for the present pressing want. Here are three books: "Concerning the Disciples," "Sketches of our Pioneers," and "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples," which, in brief, cover the ground. First-year students take the first; second-year students, the second, and third-year students, the last. These three books for one dollar. The headquarters, J. Z. Tyler, 798 Republic Street, Cleveland, O. Send to him.

Fifty thousand people should be studying these handbooks at once. Come with us and we will do you good.

Prayerful Preparation.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society is now entering upon its twenty-sixth year. This is the first year of the new century. We now have 257 missionaries out on the foreign field, including native helpers and evangelists. A number of new missionaries must be sent out during the year. This step will be taken if the receipts justify it. We owe it to ourselves and to the great heathen field to make the next offering for Foreign Missions larger than any which has gone before. The work needs to be reinforced at every point. This must be done at the earliest possible moment. New buildings must be provided for the missionaries and the work they have in hand.

We are now in the midst of good times. We cannot plead poverty as a people. The Lord has blessed us in basket and in store. If we do not go far beyond any preceding offering we will not do our duty. Last year we undertook to raise $200,000 and fell short of that amount by about $20,000. Shall we not bend every effort to reach that amount or more this year? We have more churches than ever before, a larger membership than at any time in the past. Religious bodies not as strong numerically raise three times as much for this great cause.

If the offering is what it ought to be, prayerful preparation must be made. A great offering is no accident. It is the result of careful, painstaking preparation. It is the result of much earnest thought and diligent labor. The churches should be brought face to face with the heathen world as never before, literature must be distributed, prayer-meetings must be given up to the subject, stirring addresses must be made, rousing missionary rallies must be held in every church.

The Foreign Society will furnish free of charge all needed March Offering supplies. Address F. M. Rains, Corresponding Secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, and your order will receive prompt attention. Be kind enough to state the number in your church and we will furnish you the supplies at once. Preparation is the word to emphasize now. Let it begin in good hard earnest now.

A Privilege

Thrown Away Entirely.

It is curious to observe how hard it is for some people to give up coffee drinking after they have become at least half satisfied that it is the cause of their ill health, but it becomes an easy task to give it up when one takes Postum Food Coffee in its place, providing, of course, that Postum is made according to directions, for then it has the rich, beautiful color and a satisfying taste, while the rapid improvement in health clinches the argument.

A young lady at Cambridgeport, Mass., says: "When it was shown to me plainly that my ill health and excessive nervousness was largely due to the coffee habit, I realized that I must give it up, but it was next to impossible to do so. However, I made the trial and took Postum Food Coffee, with the mental reservation of the 'privilege,' as I termed it, of drinking coffee once a week.

"Little did I dream what a true friend Postum was destined to become to me. The old stomach trouble left, the nervousness vanished, and good, natural, healthy sleep came to my relief. In less than six months I felt like another person, I was so well and happy.

"The 'reserve privilege' in regard to using regular coffee was thrown to the winds. I have not the slightest desire for it; in fact, I very much prefer my Postum to any coffee."

Our Chinese Mission.

Different localities bring us in touch with different phases of the C. W. B. M.; thus it was my good fortune to come into close contact with our Chinese work while organizing in Oregon and California.

As we wander through the crowded streets of the great metropolis, San Francisco, we find that in its very heart there exists another city of over forty thousand inhabitants, controlling about two hundred and fifty manufactories, over one hundred immense gambling holes, numerous opium dens, joss houses and theaters. But in the midst of all this cosmopolitan wickedness and strange sights, nothing impressed me more than the memories which gather around our Chinese mission in Portland.

We enter a city of about 100,000 inhabitants, cross the muddy old Willamette river forming Portland harbor, where we see the great ocean steamers anchored for cargo for foreign ports. A few blocks brings us to Chinatown, with its narrow, squalid streets, thickly lined with joss houses, theaters, gambling houses, opium dens, Chinese restaurants, and every available corner filled with laundries, dirty little shops and stores, and over all an odor hard to analyze. We try to close our ears to the deafening noises and jargon of strange voices, as we pick our way through the jostling crowd and wonder to ourselves if it is really necessary for the already narrow sidewalks to be used for an open-air show-window.

We hurry on up Second Street and stop before a dingy-looking building and gaze at the door, on which is the sign "Christian Mission." Venturing inside, we find a long hall cheerfully lighted, warmed and decorated. Jeu Hawk and Louie Hugh, leaders of the mission and formerly students of Drake University, give us a warm handshake and a greeting, which never reached our ears, for it was lost in the indiscribable medley and hubbub of voices. We look blankly around for the cause of so much systematic confusion, and behold from 30 to 50 Chinamen seated around little tables, each one studying or reciting out loud, perfectly oblivious to the distracting surroundings, as the spelling-book, grammar, geography and Bible fill the air with a mixture of discordant sounds.

A teacher, usually a young lady, sits at the end of each table of which she has charge. We sit down in one row of the chairs which extend up the middle of the hall and watch and listen. Most of the students are dressed in native costume, always black, with queer-looking black cloth shoes, the top of which extended out and over thick white soles. Some are neat and tidy, with intelligent faces and polite ways, showing the effect of prayerful Christian training. The lesson continues from seven till nine o'clock each evening, then after repeating the Lord's prayer in their native tongue, the bell taps for a short recess.

They are a social crowd and each one comes around with a smile and a handshake; as we look into their little yellow faces and at their peculiar dress, so many questions come surging into our minds. Will it in any way affect our Christian government to allow these 75,000 pagan worshipers to live on our western coast? For unlike other foreigners who settle among us, the Oriental never assimilates our ways or thoughts. Whether there is only a family or a village of them, little matter what pressure may be brought to bear upon customs and habits, he lives a typical Chinaman still, going on in the even tenor of habit and thought, regardless of American civilization. What effect will his morals, his iniquitous practice of polygamy, opium eating, excessive gambling, etc., have on our ethical rules? What about his cheap labor, and how will his vote or the votes which he buys, turn the scales on election day, when backed by those anarchist ideas and antagonistic notions of our government which are so ardently discussed in their great secret society of "Highbinders?"

But the bell taps again and there is a general clatter and skirmish into seats. We are awakened from our reverie by another medley, only louder than the first, yet there seems to be some unison about it, and from facial expressions we soon decide that they are singing in Chinese.

Then commences an hour's study of the Bible; spelling out the chapter like a little child would its primer lesson, with the teacher explaining the meaning as to a little child. Thus the hours pass by every evening in the year, and they wend their way homeward with the gospel benedictions hovering over them, instead of being mystified with the subtleties of Confucius.

Central Christian College.

The winter term at the college starts off with a large attendance of both old and new students.

E. B. Harris held a week's meeting with the Gaynor City Church during the holidays.

Many of the churches in the surrounding counties have employed student preachers for this year.

The writer closed a three weeks' meeting at Bedison, Nodaway county, Jan. 7, with 19 additions—10 confessions. Clark Warren had charge of the music. An Endeavor Society was organized. The church is in good working condition.

J. V. Coombs, of Indiana, will deliver his lecture, "Strange Things and Funny People," before the students on the night of Jan. 16.

The Maryville Church is in the midst of a meeting, with their pastor, O. W. Lawrence, doing the preaching. There were eight additions the first night. CHAS. L. BEAL.

Ohio Letter.

A happy new year to the Evangelist family. May peace and prosperity attend you all. May all your days of this century—this century that will be pre-eminently a Christian century—be happy and full of good works.

The Buckeye Disciples are rejoicing over the general and generous offerings for state missions. More churches observed Ohio Day than ever before. The aggregate of the offerings has been doubled. But many churches have not yet responded. It is not too late. An offering from eve y church would be an inspiration.

The church at Mineral Ridge remodeled their home at a cost of $2,130. It was reopened December 30th. Secretary Bartlett preached the sermon and solicited the money. L. J. McConnell and wife minister to this congregation. Mrs. McConnell is also a preacher of the Word.

George Anderson has closed his 13 years' work at Youngstown. Here is a good example of the long pastorate. From one church of 250 our people have expanded till we have three churches with about 1,500 members. Bro. Anderson has taken the church at Glenville, a suburb of Cleveland.

C. W. Huffer, the energetic pastor at Toledo Central, held his own meeting, with 22 accessions. We now have four churches in Toledo and suburbs. But we ought to have a dozen

The new chapel at Greenfield was dedicated January 6th by Secretary Bartlett. This heoric little band has been tried as by fire but they have a bright future before them now.

Wilson and Houston are in a meeting at Dayton this month, They had a good start the first week and are expecting great things. The meeting at Lima closed with about 180 additions.

Meetings are in progress at Mansfield, with Grant Speare helping the pastor, L. G. Batman; at Newark, Garry Cook singing for M. L. Bates; at Prairie Depot, M. L. Buckley, of Rushsylvania, assisting; at Middleburg, D. I. Levis, of Indiana, preaching; at Derby, Wesley Hatcher preaching; at Galion, J E. Hawes singing for Pastor Sala. Guy Hoover, of Minerva, assisted V. G. Hostetter at Zanesville, in December, with 14 accessions.

The time now draws near for the March offering for Foreign Missions. It is none too early to begin to agitate. Let it be announced from every pulpit. We ought to have 200,000 people who would give $1 on March 3, to say nothing of the $5, $10, $25, $50, $100. Our aim ought to be a half million instead of $200,000. But we are growing in the grace of giving.

DISEASE

and discomfort are not-ease and not-comfort. Ease is health; so is comfort.

You may as well be comfortable; that is healthy; as animals are. It is natural, both for you and for them.

If your ill health is caused by imperfect digestion, try Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil. It does what it does by getting the stomach going right.

We'll send you a little to try if you like.

Is it an Epidemic?

Vital Statistics Show an Alarming Increase in an Already Prevailing Disease--Are Any Exempt?

At no time in the history of disease has there been such an alarming increase in the number of cases of any particular malady as in that of kidney and bladder troubles now preying upon the people of this country.

To-day we see a relative, a friend or an acquaintance apparently well, and in a few days we may be grieved to learn of their serious illness or sudden death, caused by that fatal type of kidney trouble—Bright's disease.

Kidney trouble often becomes advanced into acute stages before the afflicted is aware of its presence; that is why we read of so many sudden deaths of prominent business and professional men, physicians and others. They have neglected to stop the leak in time.

While scientists are puzzling their brains to find out the cause, each individual can, by a little precaution, avoid the chances of contracting dreaded and dangerous kidney trouble, or eradicate it completely from their system if already afflicted. Many precious lives might have been, and many more can yet be saved, by paying attention to the kidneys.

All who have any symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble should write to-day to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a free sample bottle of Swamp-Root, the celebrated specific which is having such a great demand and remarkable success in the cure of the most distressing kidney and bladder troubles. With the sample bottle of Swamp-Root will also be sent free a pamphlet and treatise of valuable information.

He won wanderers back to their former faith, converted others, organized a band of faithful followers, secured the services of a neighboring pastor, and established for us a church home.—MYRTA RANSDELL.

Waterloo, Neb., Jan. 10.—One confession Lord's day evening, Jan. 6. Great interest awakened. Thompson visited us Monday, Jan. 7, and by her earnest manner and fluent speaking the C. W. B. M. workers were greatly strengthened and the public instructed.

A large majority of the converts are grown people. Many household conversions are among them. We have moved from the poorest building of the town to the best, which, by the help of the Master and Bro. Scoville was dedicated, free from debt, on Dec. 16th. When this man of God came to us, there were five other churches here with a larger membership than ours, now we lead them all. Our Endeavor and Bible-school have doubled in attendance and membership. A very worthy lady of the Presbyterian church also came forward at the morning hour and made the good confession and expressed her desire to be immersed and to unite with the church. In a protracted meeting in December, conducted by Bro. E. C. Wigmore, four made the confession and were baptized, and one added by statement.—R. M. MESSICK.

Family Circle.

The Shrinking World.

This shrinking world in which we live grows smaller day by day,
Till now there isn't any place so very far away;
And lands so sundered in the past that months would intervene,
Have crept so near together there is scarce a week between.

It used to be a great long while from Boston-on-the-Bay
To where the broad Pacific laves the pebbles with its spray,
But now those shores are neighbors in their nearness, so to speak,
And half a year of travel has been squeezed to half a week.

To speak with far-off India once took us full a year,
While now we simply shout "Hello!" and whisper in her ear;
And islands lost in distant seas, when history commenced,
Are chatting with us daily now since space has been condensed.

With steamship lines and railway trains and telegraph and all,
We have compressed this globe until it's just a little ball;
The land is but a step across, the sea is but a pond,
We've got this world encompassed and we sigh for worlds beyond.

We're looking toward the sky the while we fashion, year by year,
Some new and wondrous instrument to draw the planets near;
And scientists, so we are told, perchance may very soon
So do away with distance we can visit with the moon.

Struggling Toward the Light.

By Walter S. Smith.

Chapter XII.—Some Matters in Conclusion

This invitation made Timothy's eyes wet; and Paul himself choked a little when he tried to speak about it. The ten dollars he "subscribed" and paid at once into the new treasury, telling Timothy to mark it as a dollar apiece for the ten converts. "Tell them for me," said he, "that they must earn this amount by good works, and next year make and contribute an equal sum." He authorized Timothy to tell Brother Revell the forgiveness was free and full. He had suffered much pain on account of Joseph's slights, and the only penance he would entail was that he should never treat another teacher so, but seek an interview and an explanation before carrying a misunderstanding to the point of sin.

"Certainly, we must go; and I will feel free to do so, because that is the time of the year when the nights are too short for meetings."

He had run in upon Timothy as a visitor, merely to see how the church was succeeding. He was gratified to note the pride they all felt in their own activity.

Timothy sat down to write to Bro. Revell, Paul to Job Norris. His missive was full of acknowledgment of his sense of gratitude. Job had not only led him to seek the light of doctrinal teaching, but by his meek and forgiving course he had taught him the genius of the Savior's sweet spirit. "I did not know," said the teacher, "how to deal with evil-doers until you refused to reciprocate their malice." And in this spirit he wrote, telling him to look for him and Bro. Henry together on Friday before the day named.

The month passed quickly, for both men were busy. The church officers were quite willing to excuse the preacher, and Bro. Smith and Bro. Fussy shared equally in the expenses of Ruby, declaring that she must go, too, and see Bro. Norris and his family.

There was a delegation at the wharf to receive them and they were surprised that Walter Brown had his team and four-seated hack there to convey them up the hill. He made all the company get in, and declared it was an honor to him that they complied. Bertha and Bessie Norris sat with Ruby on the back seat, Job and Paul with the driver on the front seat, Mrs. Norris, Mrs. Revell and Mrs. Peak on the second seat, and Joe, Timothy and Squire Lee on the third.

Brethren Perryman, Peak and Barnet looked after the baggage and came after the hack on foot. Timothy asked the Squire what it all meant: "That these men who used to hit us so hard, all seem so friendly?" The Squire answered: "Charge it all to the grace of God, the power of the Gospel and Job Norris. Mr. Barnet was never your enemy, but a most damaging enemy to himself. He had formerly been a Baptist, but as he was guilty of selling liquors and keeping a disorderly house, we excluded him two or three years before you came among us. The two deaths in his family caused him to work, as you know, to put liquor out of the county. He was anxious to do better, but felt himself an outcast. Bro. Norris had persuaded him to come back, make acknowledgments and begin anew, and the very day he was aiming to do this, we turned Job out of the church! That deterred him till after you left; and, as he was a personal friend to Bro. Guthrie, this man prevailed on him to attend the last day he preached for us. I shall always remember the text: 'Let us search and try our ways and turn again unto the Lord.' Barnet went home thinking very seriously, and when Bro. Perryman gave his first invitation he stepped forward and craved a chance to confess his years of sin. He was so humble and so serious that no doubt was felt concerning his sincerity, and since the day of his restoration his walk has been blameless. We recently learned that it was Job Norris who unselfishly and lovingly prevailed on him to hear Bro. Guthrie's counsel and turn again to the Lord. Peak and Brown were both moved in the same way, but they could not give a 'Christian experience,' and so they did not offer themselves. Brown asked Bro. Perryman how a man could give a Christian experience when he had all along been a sinner. This question was carried to Bro. Norris, who answered: 'A sinner may be convinced of his error, may believe the Gospel and obey it; and, being then made free from his sins, he may become a servant of righteousness.' This conversation was fresh in several of our minds the day we voted away our sectarian rules and adopted our scriptural name. And the very next day Peak and Brown came forward and confessed faith in Christ. Their baptism was the beginning of great things with us. They have done more than half the engineering in the repairing of our meeting-house. Brown, for instance, drove round and raised most of the money, and himself gave us a bell worth a hundred dollars."

But here the colloquy ended, for the hack drew up in front of Barnet's and the passengers began to alight. Timothy and Ruby were to be entertained here; Bro. Guthrie at Norris', and Perryman and Matthews at Squire Lee's. The last named was just now putting on the finishing touches to his new sermon on CONSECRATION in his study at Lexington.

After supper the three ministers repaired to the house of worship and looked over the work before them preliminary to perfecting a program. 1. Ruby should be the genius to preside over the music, with singers to assist. 2. Timothy should preach on Christian Loyalty Saturday night. 3. Prof. Guthrie should review the Sunday-school lesson, using the blackboard. 4. Bro. Matthews should preach a consecration sermon and re-dedicate the church, the sermon to begin at 10:30. 5. Bro. Perryman, assisted by Elders Norris and Revell, should officiate at the table of the Lord's Supper, after which they would adjourn to dinner. 6. At three o'clock there would be reminiscences and a history of the church, led by Bro. Perryman. At the conclusion of this service Bro. Henry should display the old book, whose historic data had all been copied out, and, with any remarks he chose to make, lay it on a brazen altar on coals and burn it to ashes. 7. At night Prof. Guthrie should preach a discourse on "The Church an Evangelizing Force."

This all agreed to. The preachers separated and were soon at their rooms resting. Saturday was a fine day and Bro. Perryman's committees were all day busy with festoons and tables. The Baptists had displayed the good sense of selecting a two acre site for the church, containing its native trees and affording a copious flow of spring water. The new arrangement had only to remove a few branches and destroy a few weeds and briars to make it an ideal place for an all-day meeting. The new church front, with belfry attachment, the new white paint tastily trimmed in lemon and pink, the green shutters opening off a full outfit of bronzed fly-screens, the new roof of cedar shingles, oiled "to make them last forever," the crown of green foliage hanging not too near, from the great forest trees, the entire picture so harmonizing with God's own ideals of beauty, required but little decorating. A few roses, wreaths and ferns within, and a half dozen long tables under the trees without, seemed about all the committees needed to provide, for the glad people brought flags and garlands, and before the bell rang for the Saturday night service, the whole scene was full of life and beauty.

Timothy's audience filled the house, although the night was almost the shortest of the year and harvest was at hand. He took the same text he had taken a year before, to use as a basis of his discussion on Loyalty. It was an odd text for a sermon on Baptist Loyalty, but he had used it and made such a sermon from it. It reads: "And the people said unto Joshua, 'The Lord our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey.'" This is written in the 24th chapter and it is the 24th verse of the chapter. A year ago he had said, "God speaks through the church, and one cannot obey the voice of the Lord if he is disloyal to the church." He had applied all church allusions to the Baptist Church and used several other scriptures in support of the arguments deduced.

To-day he said: "God speaks through his Son," quoting from Hebrews 1: 1, 2 to prove it. He now pursued almost the same course of analysis taken a year ago, and landed every argument upon Christ or the Holy Spirit, and finally threw all his force into Job Norris' language to the committee: "Brethren, I cannot be disloyal to the Holy Spirit for the sake of loyalty to the Baptist Church."

The effect of it was electric. The great audience, almost in a breath, echoed "Amen!" Timothy went on to say, "We excluded Bro. Norris for that manly address, but it has been, like the sound of Luther's hammer on the church door, echoing ever since, and the Lord has blessed it to our good."

Details are not admissible. Sunday was fair and cool, and before ten o'clock the two acres were well covered with vehicles, excepting only the space reserved, and many teams were hitched on grounds adjoining. The house was packed to hear the discourse, and all the people felt that it was a most fitting time for a lesson on reconsecration. It was a fine lesson, well received. And the dedication went on without the usual scramble after money. The money had all been raised and the improvements paid for, so Bro. Matthews had only to offer it in a fervent dedicatory prayer to God. The afternoon attendance was too great for the house and a stand was made out of the tables, and the ceremony of burning the old book was performed outdoors. Timothy made a few suitable remarks, and then, while the cremation went forward, he said: "Old things are passed away: behold, all things have become new!"

With this they sang "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," Bro. Matthews pronounced the benediction, and the day-program was over.

The night sermon was a masterpiece, closing with one of Bro. Guthrie's best efforts in the way of exhortation. "Lige" Taggart had been seen on the grounds in good clothes, and already it was known by many that Timothy's letter, offering to pray for the salvation of his soul, had smitten him with shame; that he had quit drinking, and was already a pretty fair sort of citizen. But the climax came when, at Paul's earnest invitation, he and his wife and their grown daughter came forward to make confession. He asked, as an especial favor, that Timothy wait on them in baptism; this to show him how thoroughly he took back his malicious falsehood concerning him.

What then could be done but to have preaching the next day, and again at night, and although the harvest of cereal grain was on, another harvest was gathered with it, even a harvest of souls. The miserable doctor was the only one of our characters whom this meeting failed to reach.

Feeling the awful shadow of a neighborhood's detestation, he went off to Lexington to carry on a practice too abhorrent and odious to be named in print.

Paul returned with Timothy and Ruby to Freedom, via SUNRISE, and the mother-in-law, in tears, begged forgiveness and pledged to act thereafter in a manner more becoming her relationship. In their sermons there, Paul and Timothy created quite a sentiment in favor of sobriety, and if the great brewery had not been there on the hillside to browbeat the people and undo the impression for good, liquor drinking would have been done away. But this reform will have to wait until the good people are ready to say, THERE SHALL BE NO MORE BREWING OF BEER!

[THE END.]

Fooling the Dog-Catcher.

It improves the story to let the little five-year-old tot tell it herself:

"It was Fwiday," she says, "an' I were tomin' frum school an' finkin' all the time how me and Prince would have a big long play, 'tause it wouldn't be school till Monday. I was so happy that I runned an' was laughin' to myself so everybody smiled.

"But when I dot purty near home an' Prince was runnin' down th' street to meet me, barkin' an' wigglin' hisself 'tause he was so glad to see me, a big man, wif a long pole an' a net on it jumped outen' his wagon an' Prince runned right into the net.

"Then I screamed an' I frowed myself on that net just when Prince got in it, an' rolled 'roun' an' got all snarled an' the man swore, an' we kept rollin,' and I never got so dirty in my life, an' when that man pulled th' net to him I was in it an' Prince was goin' to th' back of th' house as hard as he could.

"Then a nice-lookin' gen'leman come up laughin' so hard he coughed, an' he asked did I have a tag on me, an' th' horwid man jumped in his wagon an' whipped th' horse, an' when he drove away said he would get that dog yet, an' I tole him he could ketch nothin' but little girls, an' the gen'leman laughed so he had to use his hank'chief an' said some dogs had all th' luck."—Detroit Free Press.

Doolittle's Trained Hens.

"Well, boys, what d'ye s'pose Pete Doolittle has been up to now?" demanded Job Blinkers, as he dropped into his accustomed seat and filled up the circle around the post-office stove, now utilized chiefly as a rest for the feet.

"I dunno, but I'll bet it ain't anything in the line of work—not if Pete attended to it hisself," spoke up one of the crowd.

"Guess you're right about that," rejoined Blinkers. "Doolittle never was very fond of work. And this new dodge he's been up to lately is just what one might expect from a man of that kind. He has a good-sized huckleberry-patch, and I'm dinged if Doolittle hasn't trained his hens to pick the berries. Any one would natcherly s'pose they'd gulp the berries down while pickin' them, but they don't. Doolittle has got that part of it fixed all right.

"Now, how do you s'pose he manages it? Why, he simply puts a rubber band around their necks just tight enough to keep them from swallowin' the huckleberries an' yet not tight enough to hurt them. Then he has a sort of contrivance like an old-fashioned goose-yoke hung to the neck of each hen; an' fastened to the lower end of each yoke is a light wooden pail to hold the berries. Doolittle's huckleberries are of the the low-bush variety, an' the hens have no trouble at all in reachin' the berries.

"I was over to his place for an hour or so t'other day watchin' the hens work, an' it was a sight calkilated to do a lazy man a heap of good. Doolittle seemed to be enjoying it fust-rate—fer him. There he was perched upon the fence, smokin' his pipe an' takin' things easy, while the hens were bucklin' right down to business an' snatchin' the berries off the bushes just as if they expected to git paid fer it. They seemed to know the ripe berries from the green ones, too. Anyhow I never see 'em pick any green ones, except once in a while a hen would get hold of one by mistake, and then she would drop it on the ground instead of into the pail, an' go on workin' as if nothin' had happened.

"As fast as the hens got their pails filled they would come over to the spot where Doolittle was settin', an' cluck, to let him know they were ready to be unloaded; an' then he would get down from the fence an' empty the berries out into a big basket, an' start the hens off to pickin' ag'in. I told Doolittle his plan fer gatherin' the huckleberry crop was the best that I'd run across yet, an' he sighed kinder tired-like, an' said:

"'Yes, it is purty slick, but there's one drawback to it.'

"'What's that?' says I.

"'Why, ye see, I've got to climb down off the fence every fifteen minutes or so to empty the pails, and I tell you it's wearin' on the constitution to keep it up all day. Now, if the hens knew how to turn a summerset, same as them limber-jinted chaps in a circus, I'd be all right. Then all I'd have to do would be to have a good-size box standin' in a handy place to empty the berries in, an' the end of a plank a-restin' on one side of it, with the other end a-restin' on the ground, so the hens could walk up to the top of it when they got their pails filled an' turn a summerset across the box, dumpin' the berries into it, an' then light on their feet on the other side, an' go on about their business of pickin' berries. If that could be done, as I said before, I'd be alright. But,' and Doolittle sighed once more, 'the worst of it is a hen can't be trained to turn a summerset.'

"And when I come away Doolittle was still settin' there tryin' to figger out some plan fer emptyin' them pails of berries without gettin' down off the fence."—Will S. Gidley in Woman's Home Companion.

How Eddie Preached.

"When I get big enough I'm going to be a preacher," said Eddie one day.

"What is a preacher?" asked grandma.

Eddie looked surprised. "Don't you know what a preacher is? A preacher is a man that tells the people what the Bible means. And he says, 'Thirdly, my brethren,' and everybody listens to him. It's nice to have people listen to you."

Grandma smiled. "I think you are big enough to preach now," she said.

"Really and truly, grandma?" asked the little boy eagerly.

"Yes, really and truly."

"I'm afraid not," said Eddie, after a few moments of thought, "or I'd know how and I don't."

"What does the preacher do first?" asked grandma.

"He takes a text, and then he 'splains it. I can't do that."

"Oh, yes, you can, Eddie," said grandma. "Here's a good text for you to explain: 'Be kind to one another.'"

"There's nothing to 'splain about that," said Eddie. "You just be kind to everybody and that's all there is of it."

"A good text, though, for my little preacher's first sermon. I should like to have him preach from it for a week."

"Preach a week! Why, grandma, I can't," exclaimed Eddie.

"Can't be kind to everybody you meet for one week?"

Eddie looked thoughtful. "Would that be preaching?"

"It would, and the very best kind. A good preacher has to preach in that way, or people will not listen to what he says in the pulpit."

"Well," says Eddie, with a sigh, "I suppose I can try; but I wasn't thinking of that kind of preaching."

"You will be showing everybody what that verse in the Bible means, you know," said grandma.

"It is not kind to the teacher to whisper in school," said Eddie the very next day; and he did not whisper once.

"It's not kind to Bridget to play along the road and keep my dinner waiting either," and he hurried home from school.

"It's not kind to mamma when I don't do errands promptly," and he did quickly and well whatever he was bid.

Every night and all day he thought about what was kind and tried to do it. The end of the week came.

"How do you like preaching?" asked grandma.

"Why, I like it; but, grandma, I guess everybody must have been preaching about that text, for everybody has been so kind to me."—Ex.

Pendleton and Greeley.

Major McDowell's mot reminded me of a passage of arms between Horace Greeley and Dr. William K. Pendleton, who was for many years president of Bethany College, West Virginia. He came of the old Virginia Pendleton family, which has given so many soldiers and statesmen to the republic. He was an accomplished orator, scholar and gentleman. During reconstruction days, when all the West Virginia representatives were Republicans, Dr. Pendleton, who was a Democrat, came to Washington and while here was introduced to Horace Greeley as "Dr. Pendleton, president of Bethany College, West Virginia."

Horace looked at the courtly Virginian and in his shrill tenor said:

"Judging by the sort of congressmen which West Virginia sends to Washington, I had concluded that there are no colleges in West Virginia."

"Ah, Mr. Greeley," replied Dr. Pendleton, with a graceful bow which would have done honor to Lord Chesterfield, "all those West Virginia congressmen whom you have met are Republicans! They are not fair samples of the intelligence of our state."—From Champ Clark's "Cloak Room Stories."

Filled All Requirements.

The trials of librarians in city libraries have been often cited; those of the guardians of small country libraries are of a different character, but require perhaps the exercise of even greater patience.

"Ma wants you should pick her out a book," said a freckle-faced girl to the bright young woman in charge of the free library of a New England village; "and she don't want a serious one, she says, nor she don't want a love story, without it's founded on fact. Nor of course she don't want anything she's ever read before."

The librarian tapped her pencil thoughtfully on the desk, without a trace of the despair which a chance listener to the dialogue expected to see on her face.

"Nor she don't want anything that's chopped up into short stories, she says," continued the girl, bent upon the librarian's further enlightenment, "and she wants consider'ble going on, and a lot of pictures, ma does. And she told me partic'lar to say she didn't want no di'lec' stories; she says she knows well enough how folks in the country talk."

Still the librarian thoughtfully tapped her pencil, apparently waiting for further instructions.

"She wants a real sensible book, the kind grandma likes and I like, too," volunteered "ma's" emissary; then suddenly she leaned over the librarian. "Say," she whispered hoarsely, "if there's one of the Roberson Cruzo books in, ma says you'd better gimme that."

"Certainly," said the librarian, pleasantly, and a moment later the well-thumbed copy of the famous adventures had changed hands, and the happy possessor of it departed wreathed in smiles.—Youth's Companion.

PETE.

VIII.—Close Quarters.

"I tell you, you have time enough," called Pete, looking out of her bed-room window. "Miss Dollie's house is on the other side of town. Besides, if you leave those tomatoes and things there on the ground, mamma will see um and ask questions and I'll have to tell on you and me!"

Edgar saw the wisdom of this remark, so he grabbed up the vegetables in his frantic fingers, and having filled his pockets, rushed up the ladder and tumbled them into the room. In the meantime Mr. Pendleton, who was a man with a kind heart and fiery temper, was calling from the roof of his barn. He couldn't get down without his ladder, so he was like Mr. Crusoe on his desert island. Edgar leaped to the ground and shouldering the ladder hurried over the side-fence. Lucifer began to howl and whine behind him. Looking back Edgar discovered that the paling of the fence was still fastened to the dog's leading-cord, and this paling was now caught in the water-pipe that ran down under Pete's window. When Edgar caught sight of Mr. Pendleton, that gentleman was fairly dancing up and down on the roof of his barn at a great risk to his insurance company. He was quite red in the face and his eyes would have caught Edgar on fire then and there, if eyes could make a blaze. "I am bringing back your ladder," gasped Edgar, who was exhausted from his frantic endeavors to get away before Mrs. Morris saw him. Mr. Pendleton came down to the edge of his roof and as soon as Edgar placed the ladder against it, down swarmed the angry gentleman. Edgar did not wait to meet him, but ran back into Mrs. Morris' yard to release Lucifer. Mr. Pendleton stared after the young man, too enraged to follow or utter a sound. But he soon cooled down, and went to work as if nothing had happened, concluding that Pete had got caught in the apple-tree, thus rendering the young man temporarily insane. Edgar tugged at the paling that held Lucifer a prisoner, but he could not get it loose from the cord. However, he unfastened it from the water-pipe.

"And now you'd better fly," said Pete, who had been looking down at him. "You've been so long, they must be 'most here. You take out through the garden and down by the barn, or you'll meet um at the gate. Oh, I see um! They're turning the corner. Quick, quick!" Edgar darted toward the garden followed by Lucifer. They entered the grape-arbor, which extended the entire length of the garden. The paling, which was thumping along behind the dog, got wedged between some grape-vines, so the young man had to stop and extricate him. When he was loose, the family party had entered the yard and were so near, Edgar was afraid to move. He crouched in the dense shade, wondering how he had ever got into such a disgraceful situation. But suppose Mrs. Morris found him? He could not let her think he was stealing grapes! Why had he not gone boldly forth to meet her? Then he must have told of Pete's wicked adventure down the ladder. Now, Edgar could not endure the thought of telling on Pete; it would wreck forever his hope of making her his friend; and Mrs. Morris would disapprove of his part in the adventure, no matter what he might say. Had he not taken Mr. Pendleton's ladder to conceal Pete's escape from just confinement? So you see, Edgar could make mistakes, just like other people. Had there been somebody in this tale that always did right, like some good little boys in Sunday-school books, such a person could have come forward now and redeemed the situation. But all the characters in this history are just people, and if any of them die it won't be because they are too good. And yet, notice what trouble they got into when they did wrong. I call your attention to Mr. Edgar Brown cowering and shuddering there in that grape-arbor, down on his knees among the grub-worms and fallen plums and henpecked grapes, trying to escape detection.

"Poor Pete!" Edgar heard Madge exclaim. "Mamma, don't you think she's been punished enough? It is such a lovely afternoon and she all shut up where she can hardly get a breath of air!"

"She must be punished," said Mrs. Morris firmly. Then she called, "Pete?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Pete in a mournful voice as she looked out of her window.

"You are there, are you?" said Mrs. Morris, as if she had entertained a vague fear that her little daughter might have leaked out of a key-hole. Pete did not think it necessary to answer. "Pete, why are you not in bed?" No answer. "Go to bed now, or I'll come up and put you to bed."

"Mamma," said Pete plaintively, "isn't it punishment enough just to keep me prisoner, when Letitia is away gathering flowers in the woods with Mrs. Pendleton? And I was to of been with um. Ain't it enough for me just to have to pass my time all locked up?"

(Oh, Pete!)

"Poor child!" said Mrs. Morris to Jennie.

"I'm just playing on the carpet," said Pete, "and I'm playing that the flower-pictures on it are real flowers and I am gathering them in the woods and the bed is the creek and the washstand is a high, high hill that I have to climb and when you hear me jumping, it is over my trunk, because that is a great big stone that stands right in my path."

"Oh, mamma!" cried Madge, "lock me up with Pete and let me gather carpet-flowers with her. Oh, mamma, please lock me up!"

"Yes, Madge," called Pete, "it's lots of fun. I go out hunting, too; I take my gun and slip through the trees till I track a deer and then I hit him real quick over the anthers, and dispatch him. The flies is the deers."

"Mamma," said Madge, "may I be locked up with Pete?"

"No, you may not. And Pete, go to bed this instant, and not another sound must I hear from you! What's the matter, Jennie?"

"Why, mamma," said the young lady, rising from a stooping position, "here is a tomato! I wonder how it could have come here?"

Mrs. Morris examined it. "It came out of my garden," she said, "Pete!"

There was no answer. "I expect she's already gone to bed," suggested Madge. They entered the house carrying the tomato. Edgar seized this opportunity to escape, first cutting the paling loose from Lucifer's cord. As he slipped over the lot-fence, feeling very much as if he were the tramp's brother, he heard the voice of Mr. Pendleton call, "Mrs. Morris, did Pete get hurt? wasn't she fastened somehow in her apple-tree?"

"No, Mr. Pendleton, I have been obliged to confine her in her room for the day," was the answer.

"Oh!" said Mr. Pendleton. That was all he said. He knew Pete well enough to understand the rest without being told a word about his ladder. Mr. Pendleton had a violent temper, but there was one thing he didn't do; he didn't tell on people. Doubtless this was wrong, and he should have tried to help raise all the children in his neighborhood. It may seem strange, but Mr. Pendleton was a great favorite with children.

The Army of Health

THE ARMY IN THE PHILIPPINES INSIGNIFICANT COMPARED WITH THIS ONE.

If all people in the United States, Canada and Great Britian who make daily use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets could be assembled together it would make an army that would outnumber our army of one hundred thousand by at least five to one.

Men and women, who are broken down in health, are only a part of the thousands who use this popular preparation, the greater number are people who are in fair health but who know that the way to keep well is to keep the digestion perfect and use Stuart's Tablets as regularly as meal time comes to insure good digestion and proper assimilation of food.

Prevention is always better than cure and disease can find no foothold if the digestion is kept in good working order by the daily use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Mr. Thomas Seale, Mayfield, Calif., says: "Have used and recommended Stuart's Tablets because there is nothing like them to keep the stomach right."

Miss Lelia Dively, 4627 Plummer St., Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "I wish everyone to know how grateful I am for Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I suffered for a long time and did not know what ailed me. I lost flesh right along until one day I noticed an advertisement of these tablets and immediately bought a 50 cent box at the drug store. I am only on the second box and am gaining in flesh and color. I have at last found something that has reached my ailment."

From Mrs. Del. Eldred, Sun Prairie, Wis., "I was taken dizzy very suddenly during the hot weather of the past summer. After ten days of constant dizziness I went to our local physician, who said my liver was torpid and I had overheated my blood; he doctored me for two weeks without much improvement; I finally thought of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets (which I had used long before for various bad feelings) and the first three tablets helped me. They are easily the best all around family medicine I ever used."

The army of people who take Stuart's Tablets are mostly people in fairly good health, and who keep well by taking them regularly after meals. They contain no opiates, cocaine or any cathartic or injurious drugs, simply the natural peptones and digestives which every weak stomach lacks.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists everywhere in United States, Canada and Great Britain.

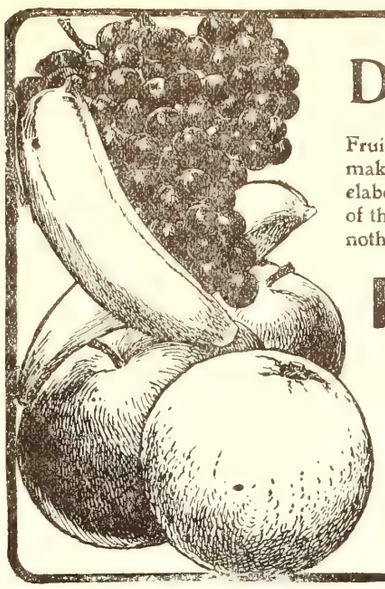
Christ Silences the Pharisees.*

It was Tuesday, the third day of "Passion Week," and Jesus was again in Jerusalem. His triumphal entry took place on "Palm Sunday," as it is now called. He had returned to Bethany that night to sleep. On Monday morning, on his way to the city, he had approached a fig tree, whose thick leaves seemed to promise fruit; but there was none. Declaring that it should never again bear fruit, he went his way, and entered the temple. Here he found the same conditions as prevailed on his first visit, three years before. Its sacred courts were defiled by the noisy and greedy traffickers, whom he once more expelled, with sternest rebuke. He spent the day in works of mercy, and again retired to Bethany at its close. On Tuesday morning, as he passed, with his disciples, the fig tree whose doom he had pronounced the previous day, they saw that it was withered root and branch; and the lessons of that marvelous incident never faded out of their memory.

It was manifest to the leaders of the people that the growing power of Jesus must be checked, or the whole nation would go after him. If he were suffered to assume authority over the very courts of the temple, and to make them the scene of his daily discourses and miracles of healing, he would soon be declared the Christ, and the direst tumults might follow. They therefore send a deputation to him, demanding his authority for the things he said and did. His reply staggered them. "By what authority did John the Baptist teach?" They could not say that it was by divine authority, or Jesus would demand why, then, they had refused to accept his testimony concerning himself. They dared not say that he taught without authority, for the people honored John as a prophet. They had to say, We know not. Then they had no right to question the authority of him whom the Baptist introduced as the Messiah. By three striking parables of warning, namely, the Two Sons, the Faithless Servants in the Vineyard, and the Marriage Feast, he portrayed their stubborn rejection of the kingdom of heaven, and the ruin that must result to their nation because of it.



His enemies then attempt to accomplish by guile what they have failed to do by direct attack. Pharisees and Herodians, natural enemies, combine to draw the Master into a compromising situation, where he may be condemned either as a heretic or a traitor. But his calm soul is undisturbed, and he answers them by one of those simple, comprehensive maxims which carry conviction to every heart. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." Then the Sadducees, with their contempt for the spiritual hopes of Israel, as to a future life, seek to embarrass the Savior by a hypothetical case, of a woman who becomes the wife of seven brothers in succession, all of whom die childless. Whose wife will she be, in the resurrection? is their query, which they propound with supreme assurance that it will puzzle the Nazarene Rabbi. His reply confounds them, as he quotes the language of Jehovah to Moses, "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." The bodies of the patriarchs had long been dust. Did they believe that God gloried in being the God of a handful of ashes, a chance dry bone, or the foul air of an empty tomb? He is the God of the living, and all live unto Him. As to their question, they are ignorant of the meaning of the Scriptures, or the significance of the resurrection. This is to be, not a mere re-awakening but a transformation. "The world to come was not to be a reproduction of that which had passed away—else why should it have passed away?—but a regeneration and renovation; and the body with which we were to be clothed would be like that which angels bear." Earthly relations would be exalted into heavenly ones, and spiritual communion and joys swallow up all that were merely temporal.

We have deemed the approach to our lesson of sufficient importance to give it thus much space. But little is left for the direct text, but this is so explicit in its teachings as to require but little comment. Encouraged by the discomfiture of the Sadducees, whose materialism was hateful to them, the Pharisees again approach the Master, and through one of their number, a scribe, or lawyer, ask him, "Master, which is the great commandment in the law?" Those first in esteem among them were those pertaining to such questions as the Sabbath, circumcision, paying of tithes and ceremonial purity. It was their constant complaint that Jesus so often seemed to hold these in light esteem. The Master gives them a frank and prompt reply. He tells them that the first in importance of all divine requirements is that of a supreme love for God, which shall involve the entire man, heart, mind, soul and strength. Without this love, all outward acts of worship are futile. When they flow from this fount of love, the least of them becomes a noble and gracious deed. Nor does such a religion stop with the service of God in worship. Closely associated with this greatest of the commandments is one only second in the divine regard, namely, unselfish love for man. All the law and the prophets derive their value from these two supreme principles, and are to be honored and obeyed as they exemplify their spirit and produce their fruit. There was enough of the love of truth in the heart of the scribe who had asked the question to make him respond to Jesus' words with a confession which showed he at least had not studied the Old Testament Scriptures in vain. He was not far from the kingdom; and let us hope that the sentiment which found expression in his frank words at this critical hour deepened until it brought him into the company of those whose whole lives were henceforth to be dominated by the love of God and their fellow men.

Though the cavilers were now silenced, Jesus would not allow them to depart from his presence until he had forced home upon them the truth concerning himself, and compelled them to again search the Scriptures which testified of him. So he put to them this question, "What think ye of the Christ, whose son is he?" They answer at once, that he is to be the son of David, for this was the teaching of their Scriptures, and the expectation of their nation. Jesus immediately places them in a quandary by quoting one of their favorite Messianic passages, from the 110th Psalm, in which their great king David had spoken of the Messiah as his Lord, and as being promised by Jehovah the supremacy over all his enemies. It was impossible, according to Jewish ideas of the relations between parent and child, that David should have called his own son his Lord. To suggest the fact was sufficient; and they were speechless. The Messiah must be, according to this undisputed declaration of David himself, more than his mere descendant. There was but one conclusion from these premises; and that was that the Messiah, though the son of David according to the flesh, was the Son of God according to the spirit. They slunk away from the Master, unable to meet his more than human wisdom, and unwilling to acknowledge his true claim upon their faith and obedience.

The question which has come down the ages with increasing demand that every man shall answer it is, "What think ye of the Christ?" Still are there those who deem him but the son of David, but a would-be Savior and reformer of his people, whose earthly aims were doomed to failure. But his character and life, and the increasing influence he has exercised upon human history, make this answer utterly inadequate. It would set at defiance every principle that embodies itself in the phenomena of cause and effect. Truth does not spring out of imposture, sanity from madness, or holiness out of gross deception. Others answer the question by saying that Jesus was merely a great teacher, eminent among the shapers of the world's thought. Nicodemus thought this, but Jesus taught him that not mere wisdom, but a new birth, was the supreme need of man. And this, too, has been confirmed by history, and Jesus is the great Regenerator of the race. Others, like the rich young ruler, hail Jesus as "Good Master," and think to place the crown of mere human goodness upon his brow. As then, so now, he repudiates it, and will have no chaplet of merit that is not gathered from the tree of eternal life and truth in heaven. If he was no more than a good man, he was not that; for he gave his life in testimony that he was the Son of God. We are brought at last to the answer given by his own disciples, those who knew him longest and best, those who drank in his spirit, and spent their lives in trying to make men know him as they had known him, to love him as they loved him: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Blessed confession, which brings answer in his acknowledgement of us before the throne of his Father and ours, in heaven. Let it be our daily object to repeat it, in word and deed, till the whole world unites in its sincere acceptance.

Missions: Resolutions.

TOPIC FOR JANUARY 27.

(Rom. 1:14-16.)

Christianity differs from the highest of all other religions—the religion of the Jews—in being universal. It is for all nations. It is not for Americans alone, nor for Little Englanders, nor for Canadians, but for all men.

The Christian is his brother-man's keeper. The question of Cain was answered by Jesus, and the answer was echoed in stentorian tones by Paul, with an everlasting yea. Thou art thy brother's keeper!

The Christian, therefore, is debtor both to Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond and free. His obligation is bounded only by the limits of the world.

At this season of the year while we are resolving, why should we not resolve to renew our covenant with our Master whom we serve; to agree again to pay a part of the great debt we are owing to our fellowmen. While we are resolving for our part in the twentieth century, why not resolve that it shall be, so far as we can make it, the most missionary century in the history of the world, even as the nineteenth has been hitherto?

Our resolutions might follow such an outline as this:

I agree to talk in favor of missions whenever I can, without thrusting the subject unduly upon people.

I agree to combat, as far as I am able, the unjust statements sometimes made by an ignorant press or by ignorant people regarding the effect of missions. For example, the stuff that has been written about the missionaries causing the recent troubles in China. I'll quote U. S. Minister Chas. Denby, who said that the missionaries were most potent as an influence for good in the Orient, and our government owes a great deal to the missionaries. I'll point out the deep respect shown by our government and by the commonwealth and the city of New York to the visiting missionaries at Ecumenical Council of Missions last spring.

Furthermore, I agree to suggest to my minister now and then that I, with others, would be pleased to hear a word from him on missions. It will have effect.

I will agree to give freely when the March offering is taken and to give systematically to the other missionary interests of the church, as well.

I agree to pray for missions.

Resolutions are good things. They sometimes break themselves. Astonishing how they do! But they are good, for a' that. There are other places besides hell that are paved with good resolutions broken. There's the home-hearth, there's the office floor, there's the pulpit, there's the floor under the pew—all have a broken stone here and there. But 'tis better to resolve and break than never to resolve at all. It is the pursuit of an ideal. 'Tis far better to resolve and keep. It is the approach to an ideal. Let's resolve to be missionary, and let's keep the resolution.

He was married February, 1844, to Mary Fall, and the same year was baptized by Benj. Franklin. He served the cause officially in several places where he lived. From Ohio in 1847 he moved to Wabash county, Ind., to Stork county, Ill., in 1854, to Dickinson county, Kan., in 1872, and to Payette, Idaho, April, 1900, where on Dec. 26, he died at the home of his son, Bro. A. Hart. Since the death of his wife in Kansas in 1878 he has made his home with his children. When very feeble he would appear in the house of God, and none seemed so happy as he. His voice was heard the last time in church not many days before his death, offering thanks at the Lord's table. This young church feels the loss thus sustained by this dear brother's departure from amongst us.

JINNETT.

On the evening of Jan. 2, Bro. David G. Jinnett was called from a bed of sickness and pain to the glorious presence of the Father above. He had been sick about a year, bearing all patiently, but still wishing to depart and be with Christ. He died at the home of his son near Mt. Olive, N. C., with whom he had lived for a number of years. Bro. Jinnett was received into the fellowship of the Christian Church in 1887, having been converted under the ministry of Bro. Moses G. Moye. From the times of his conversion to the hour of his death he lived a consistent Christian life. He leaves a family of six sons and one daughter to mourn his loss, his wife having preceded him to the better land eleven years ago. One of his sons, W. R. Jinnett, is pastor of the Christian Church at Atlanta, Ill.

R.

LOWRY.

John Albert Lowry was born July 16, 1871, in Wadsworth county, O.; died at Gibson City, Ill., Nov. 19, 1900. He was the third son of Mr. and Mrs. Emanuel Lowry. His home since four years of age has been at Gibson City, Ill. He entered the University of Illinois in 1890, and was graduated from that institution in 1894. In 1895 he was elected to the Chair of Mathematics in Eureka College, and continued in this position until compelled to resign last February od account of failing health. Vainly he sought to regain his health. The pine-clad mountains of North Carolina and the desert climate of Arizona proved equally unavailing and he returned to his home only a few days before the end came.

SAUNDERS.

Mrs. Sarah Saunders was born in Casey county, Ky., Aug. 2, 1827, died at her daughter's home, Jacksonville, Mo., Dec. 7, 1900, aged 73 years. She came to Missouri in an early day, was married three times and survived her last husband one year. She professed religion when quite young and lived true to her God. She will be held in affectionate remembrance.

SEELY.

S. F. Seely was born in Ohio and died at Cedar Rapids, Ia., Oct. 15, 1900, aged 65 years. For many years he was church treasurer and deacon. In the early days of the history of the Cedar Rapids church he gave liberally in time and money for its support, and the welfare of the church always was dear to his heart. For several years he was a great sufferer but he never complained. No one ever failed to know what Bro. Seely's views were on important matters. His intense earnestness in stating his position and advocating it would sometimes seem like a gathering storm but when he got nearer to you and you saw into the purpose of his great heart, the threatening clouds would break away and there would appear the sunshine of love. No kinder-hearted man ever touched my life. I loved him the more because he sometimes wounded me when my assurance needed curbing. He belonged to a historic family. Robert Seely, his ancestor, came over from England in the Winthrop fleet in 1630. He left to his four children and wife the precious memory of a noble life that loved truth and hated even the appearance of pretence.

LEVI MARSHALL.

WILLIAMS.

William Morgan Williams was born in Carthaganshire, South Wales, Nov. 3, 1836. He departed this life at his home in Brandon, Ia., Dec. 18, 1900. In early manhood he served three years under the stars and stripes. He was a soldier brave and true, an earnest and faithful member of the church, courteous in manner, noble in manhood, zealous in duty, and firm in the faith. He leaves a wife and six children and a wide circle of friends who mourn their loss. He bore his intense sufferings with heroic fortitude. In the furnace fires of his affliction his faith was only burnished into a brighter glow. And his last words were, "God is good." Memorial services were conducted by the writer.

THE CAMPBELL LIBRARY

TEN DOLLARS TIME PAYMENTS

This is an offer that we deem worthy to start off a new year and a new century. During the year 1900 we sold a great many sets of Alexander Campbell's Works, but we know that there are yet thousands of persons who should have these books who have not yet secured them. It is to these that we now appeal. To the set of Campbell's Works we have added two volumes (see list below), which naturally belong with The Campbell Library. The price of Campbell's Works is $8.00. By adding these two volumes the price is made $10.00—thus permitting The Campbell Library to be purchased on the Instalment Plan. The Library contains the following works:

The Christian System.
Popular Lectures and Addresses.
Lectures on the Pentateuch.
The Christian Baptist.
Evidences of Christianity.
Living Oracles.
Christian Baptism.
Campbell-Purcell Debate.
Letters to a Skeptic.
Life and Death.
Sermon on the Law.

Life of Alexander Campbell.
By T. W. GRAFTON.

Alexander Campbell's Theology.
By W. E. GARRISON.

Three of the works are pamphlets; all the rest are splendid volumes, bound either in cloth or leather. The price that we ask is very low for such books. Until a few months ago Campbell's works sold much higher. We made a substantial cut in prices, that the works might have a larger circulation.

EASY TO BUY. Any person who desires the Campbell Library may easily secure it. Any person favorably known to us, or who can give good reference, may purchase it by paying $2.00 down and $2.00 per month for four months. If you wish to take advantage of this plan notify us, and we will send you an agreement to sign. When you return the agreement, with first payment of $2.00, we send you the books, prepaid.

Book Notes.

The instalment plan in our book department is receiving the practical endorsement of a number of our patrons. Scores of letters contain, in substance, this statement: "The instalment plan is just the thing. It is what I have been waiting for." We are much gratified that our efforts to make it easy for our patrons to secure good books are appreciated. We believe that the libraries of many of our preachers will be enriched and improved by this new plan, that their sermons will consequently be better, fresher and stronger, and that our cause will be thereby benefited.

Let us repeat the conditions attached to our time payment or installment plan. Firstly, it does not apply to orders for less than $10.00. Smaller amounts than this should be cash. Secondly, it does not apply to song books. Thirdly, we can only extend the time payment privilege to persons who are well known to us, or to those who can furnish first-class reference, or endorsement from responsible parties. This last condition has been overlooked by a number of our patrons who have desired to take advantage of the privilege. In thus asking for endorsement, we are not casting any reflection on the honesty of any one. We are but exercising a common business precaution. We are now selling books at such low prices that we cannot be too careful in extending credit. One account lost would kill the profit from a score of good accounts. Do not, therefore—unless you are confident that you are personally well known to us—ask for the privilege of securing books on time payments without sending, along with the request, good endorsements. Have the cashier of your bank write a line vouching for you, or refer us to persons who know you, and who are known to us.

Let it be remembered, too, that we shall expect monthly payments to be made promptly, and without a reminder from us. We are making very easy terms; the size of the monthly payment is so small that they can be easily paid on time, if purchasers do not become careless and forgetful. We are writing these warnings beforehand, so we shall not have to write them later in the way of reproof.

We repeat, on this page, the announcement of The Campbell Library. For the preacher and for the earnest, intelligent Disciple, we have made no better offer. These works should be read and studied by everyone who is at all interested in the history and the genius of our plea. The offer is a most liberal one. A great many are securing it on the installment plan.

Do not forget that the offers in our Special Christmas Catalogue are still good, unless there is a special stipulation to the contrary. Our patrons will probably never have a better opportunity to secure many of the standard works in English literature at nominal prices. There are some books that everyone should read—that every intelligent, well-educated person is supposed to have read. If you have hitherto neglected this part of your education, this is your opportunity.

Nothing is so utterly worthless as poor music. In the selection of a song book for church or Sunday-school, much care should be exercised. No book should be purchased just because it is cheap. The country is flooded with trashy "music," written to fill up books of "sacred" music. This stuff ought to be sold by the yard, or by the pound. It is without melody or rhythm. Such trash is unsingable, and yet it is safe to say that three-fourths of all the hymn-books published in this country are largely filled up with this sort of stuff. Not so with The Gospel Call and Silver and Gold. Neither of these books contains a single piece put in to pad, but every selection was chosen because it had a value, was singable and worth singing. Both these books have had a very large circulation and are daily growing in popularity. They are praised and endorsed wherever they are used. If you are about to purchase new books, be sure you examine these splendid collections before making a choice.

From all parts of the country come words of enthusiastic praise for the Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901. The great army of our Sunday-school workers unreservedly endorse our claim that it stands at the head of all "helps" for the superintendent, teacher and advanced pupil in the Sunday-school. Every teacher owes it to himself and to those whom he teaches to supply himself with the very best help for his work, and the teacher who is doing without the Christian Lesson Commentary is depriving himself and his class of the benefit of the very best help. This splendid volume contains 429 pages, 168 maps, engravings, diagrams, charts, etc., dictionary of Bible proper names, with pronunciation and meaning, chronological tables, etc., besides complete, clear, practical comments on the International lessons for 1901. It is handsomely bound in cloth, and the price is $1.00, postpaid. Price per dozen, not prepaid, is $9.00.

"IN FAITH, UNITY; IN OPINION AND METHODS, LIBERTY; IN ALL THINGS, CHARITY."

Vol. xxxviii. St. Louis, Mo., Thursday, January 24, 1901. No. 4.

Current Events.

Queen Victoria died at Osborne House at seven o'clock Tuesday evening. Edward VII is King of England.—(Dispatch received as we go to press.)

Queen Victoria. The world is waiting hour by hour for the news that Queen Victoria has passed away. The wear and tear of more than eighty years of royal life has taken the strength of her naturally vigorous constitution and paralysis is hastening the end. The English royal family is gathered at Osborne House on the Isle of Wight where the Queen lies, and Emperor William of Germany, her grandson, has hastened to her bedside, although his mother, Dowager Empress Frederick, the oldest daughter of Queen Victoria, is at the same time critically ill in Berlin. The end cannot be a matter of more than a few hours, and probably before this reaches the reader, the Victorian Era will be at an end. It seems like the closing of a century and it would be as appropriate to recount the events and achievements of the Age of Victoria, as a distinct epoch in human history, as it was to summarize the results of the nineteenth century. Only a few days ago the Queen, who is now approaching her eighty-second birthday, passed the age of her grandfather, George III, who up to that time, was the oldest of all British sovereigns, and she has long since been the oldest reigning sovereign in Europe. All the royal houses of Europe, except those of Spain, Italy, Austria and Turkey are connected with Queen Victoria either by blood or by marriage, and her passing away will probably be the occasion of more genuine and wide-spread grief than would be called forth by the death of any other person now living. All preparations have been made for the accession of the Prince of Wales as King Edward VII.

Cadets Abolish Hazing. As a result of the investigation brought on by the Booz case, the West Point cadets have unanimously voted to abolish the practice of hazing. The action was entirely voluntary and was something of a surprise to the authorities. The young men are to be congratulated upon having the mental acumen to see, when the fact was clearly pointed out to them in open court, that hazing, as they practiced it, was a mixture of cruelty, cowardice and stupidity, though they had not been able to take exactly that view of the case before. It is an old custom, established long ago, for the origin of which the present cadets are in no way responsible. They have been guilty of continuing a bad and foolish practice, but every one knows how much easier it is to continue any practice, good or bad, than to put a stop to it. The cadets will doubtless be heartily glad to have the custom abolished, just as the Yale undergraduates cherished a secret satisfaction, concealed by much ostentatious grumbling, when the old cane-rush was done away. The West Point boys have had their fair share of criticism lately and, unlike some of their elders, they have learned their lesson. There have fallen, as it were, scales from their eyes, and they see things differently now. The investigation has failed to prove what it started out to prove, that Cadet Booz was killed by hazing, but it has revealed a good many other things to the cadets as well as to the public. It will be a favor to everybody if the press will drop its criticisms for a while and give the boys a chance to show how well they have learned their lesson.

Gov. Dockery and Wine-Rooms. True to our best expectations of him, Governor Dockery has taken steps within a week after his Inaguration for the abatement of the wine-room evil in St. Louis. A temporary appointment has been made of an Excise Commissioner who, there is every reason to expect, will issue licenses with a discretion which was wholly lacking in the recent incumbent of that office. The Governor has also written to the President of the Police Board asking "the hearty cooperation of the Police Department and the Excise Commissioner in the vigorous enforcement of the laws to the end, especially, that there may be the speediest possible suppression of what is commonly known as the wine-room evil." A "wine-room" is, in plain terms, a house of ill-fame licensed to sell liquor. The terrific danger of such an institution need not be dwelt upon. If additional legislation is needed to stamp it out, let us have the legislation. Three bills to this end have lately been introduced in the Missouri Legislature by Senator Walker of St. Charles. But the enforcement of the laws, both present and prospective, depends upon the Excise Commissioner and the police force. The Governor is doing his share and there is reason to hope that his St. Louis appointees will do theirs.

St. Louis Politics. St. Louis is at present full to overflowing of mayoralty candidates and possibilities. He is an inconspicious citizen who has not yet been "mentioned" for the office. The approach of the World's Fair in 1903, the necessity for a general cleaning up of the city before that time, and the dismal failure of the present administration from every point of view, emphasize the importance of the spring election. The latest candidate is ex-Mayor Noonan, who is put forward by what styles itself the "Non-partisan Business Men's Association." Angels and ministers of grace defend us from any more Noonan! He has been tried. The platform of the said Association with the alluring name, is "clean streets and a business administration." Clean streets are not likely to come from dirty politics, which is the only sort their candidate has ever yet been conspicuously associated with. The election contest in the Twelfth Congressional District continues. The Election Commissioners have finally surrendered the ballots to the federal authorities for a re-count. It has already been shown that there were tremendous frauds in the registration and the report of the Grand Jury tells the story of force and fraud and undue influence at the polls. The records show that 1,600 persons were naturalized during the first fifteen days of October—over 500 of them in one day—and the clerk of the office testifies that he did his part without the usual fee "to help the party."

New Senators. During the last few days several state legislatures have elected or re-elected United States Senators. Mr. Hoar of Massachusetts and Mr. Frye of Maine were continued in office with no serious opposition. The re-election of Mr. Cullom in Illinois was not accomplished without a struggle. His rivals were ex-Gov. Tanner and congressmen Hitt, Cannon and Prince, all of whom with one accord withdrew their names just before the final Republican caucus and made a unanimous rush to get in the Cullom wagon. Mr. Cullom will celebrate his political semi-centennial two years hence, having served his state since 1853 as successively legislator, congressman, governor and senator. Mr. Quay, of Pennsylvania, was elected to succeed himself by a majority of three. His term would have begun with the present congress if the legislature had not refused to elect him a year ago; so he took his seat in the Senate at once and received a flowery ovation which deluged the desks of his neighbors in the senate-chamber as well as his own. The odor of a carload of roses, however, cannot kill the unsavory odor which exhales from Mr. Quay's political record. W. A. Clark, of Montana, whose recent election to the Senate was disallowed on account of the bribery by which it was shown to have been obtained, was re-elected, this time without conspicuonsly corrupt methods. The death of Marcus Daly, Clark's ancient enemy, weakened the opposition. The victory of Clark was celebrated at Helena in true frontier style with champagne flowing at the victor's expense at every bar in the city as free as ice-water in August.

Lynching at Leavenworth. The burning of a negro at the stake at Leavenworth, Kan., last week was the usual story—a crime, a single report by way of evidence, an outburst of popular fury against the suspected criminal, distrust of the courts as instruments of justice, a threat to the sheriff and a lynching. Enough has perhaps already been said in condemnation of the act, and a city, 5,000 of whose inhabitants could knowingly consent to such a deed, has become an object of proper scorn wherever law is reverenced. Equally disgraceful is the resistance of the local authorities to the attempts to investigate and place the blame. It is probable that the Legislature will take up the case, since the city has virtually refused to do so. One result of the event may be to restore the death penalty in Kansas.

Mob in Wichita. A band of anti-saloon women, more zealous than discreet, have taken into their own hands the work of suppressing the saloons in Wichita, Kan. In defiance of the state prohibition law, saloons are allowed to run openly without let or hindrance from the local authorities. A group of crusaders, led by Mrs. Nation, attacked two of the principal saloons and destroyed about $1,500 worth of plate glass and mirrors before the police got the insurrection under control, and the women are now in jail awaiting trial. Opinion will doubtless be divided among temperance people as to the moral quality of this violent procedure. To our mind it is precisely on a par with lynching, except that it issues in the destruction of property instead of destruction of life. Compare it with the act of the mob in Leavenworth. In both cases there was a crime to be punished. In both cases there was reason to believe that it would not be punished by due process of law unless extraordinary measures were taken. In both cases private individuals took the law into their own hands and did by violence what the court would not do. We condemn the lynching; shall we not condemn the policy of mirror-smashing? And condemn it not as an outburst of temperance fanaticism—for we will not yield a whit to Mrs. Nation in our devotion to the cause of temperance—but as an act of anarchy. The condemnation of the Leavenworth mob implies no defense of the criminal which it punished, and the condemnation of the Wichita female mob involves no defense of the illegal saloons which it attacked. Mrs. Nation is said to have "pulled the ears" of the sheriff who attempted to arrest her. If ear-pulling must be a part of a temperance crusade it would be better, we suggest, to apply the remedy directly to the local judges and police authorities who have permitted the saloons to exist in defiance of the law. It does no good to attack the saloon-keeper and his glass-ware—especially since the latter is probably fully insured against breakage and the former doubtless carries an accident policy. Better attack those official who have sworn to enforce the laws and perjure themselves daily in the neglect of their obvious duty. With Wichita and Leavenworth both breaking loose in one week, the classic question again suggests itself: "What's the matter with Kansas?"

Roosevelt and the Bears. Theodore Roosevelt, Vice-President elect, is giving daily demonstrations of the strenuous life in his hunting trip in Colorado. According to the accounts of the daily press he is having a lively time among the mountain-lions, bears and other "varmint" of the Rockies. One story is told of a perilous adventure, wherein Roosevelt boldly held his ground against a charging bear, fired several shots at it—with more courage than accuracy, perhaps, for the beast was not stopped—and then stumbled and fell when he began his retreat. The gentleman from New York scrambled out of the way just in time and his companions killed the bear. All this is very good and is excellent training for the activities of political life, but the presidency of the Senate is a task which has hitherto been supposed to make a special demand upon the passive virtues.

Mr. Cleveland's Criticisms. The political sphinxes have all broken their silence almost simultaneously, and the administration is perhaps just now more richly endowed in the matter of critics than it has ever been before. Ex-President Harrison has added to his Ann Arbor speech an article in the North American Review, and Ex-President Cleveland, after diagnosing the disease of the Democratic party in the Saturday Evening Post, has paid his respects to our present foreign policy in a speech before the Holland Society in New York. And these in addition to those regular critics which the administration has always with it. Mr. Cleveland's speech was a gloomy utterance, any way one looks at it. Indeed, he seemed to consider it so himself and accounted for it on the ground that "Dutch conservatism" must be ill at ease while experiments of such weighty import are being made. The Republic is adrift on strange seas with neither needle nor chart and it will be a matter more of luck than of seamanship if it ever gets out by any other means than a direct return. He generously admits that "the Republic will in some sort be saved" but fears that it will only be "with the germs of decay fastened upon its vitals." His description of the wars in the Philippines and in South Africa as "killing the natives to possess their lands" will not strike the average well-informed reader as a true or fair statement of the purpose of the United States and Great Britain in these matters.

Gen. Harrison's Criticism. The relations between Ex-President Harrison and the present administration have not been conspicuously cordial of late. Gen. Harrison declined to engage actively in the recent campaign, and his son, Russell Harrison, has been rather summarily dismissed from the army. Rumor has it that the first of these two events was the cause of the second, but the rumor is unconfirmed, and besides lacks verisimilitude. The fact is that the President and Gen. Harrison take very different views of certain questions, notably the application of the Constitution to acquired territory. In his speech at Ann Arbor and still more explicitly in his article in the current number of the North American Review, Gen. Harrison maintains that the action of the administration in holding Porto Rico and the Philippines without extending to them those guarantees which are contained in the Constitution, is illegitimate and dangerous, and that such territorial government, independent of the Constitution, falls little short of tyranny. Mr. Charles A. Gardiner, in a recent speech before the Bar Association of New York, criticized Gen. Harrison's position and recalled his own attitude when, as President a few years ago, he recommended the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, on the condition that their separate tariff be maintained for one year from the date of annexation pending congressional action and that the Chinese inhabitants of those islands be still excluded from the United States. Mr. Gardiner goes far in saying that the forthcoming decision of the supreme court in regard to the Porto Rican and Philippine tariffs will have little to do with the case, because the Judiciary is not supreme over the Executive and Legislative branches of the government, but co-ordinate with them. Looking at the matter from the standpoint of a layman in law, it would seem that the decision of the supreme court would have very much to do with the case if the court has any function to perform at all.

River and Harbor Bill. The fight over the appropriation for the Missouri River was not over when the committee reported against it. Mr. Clark of Missouri made a strong argument in favor of continuing the appropriation to keep the river navigable, even if it is not navigated, on the ground that the existence of a navigable stream prevents an undue rise of freight rates. This was in answer to Mr. Hepburn's plea for retrenchment and his claim that the Missouri River was not practically navigable and could not be made so. The bill was finally passed by the House as the committee reported it, but with amendments suggested by Mr. Hepburn, giving to the owners of land along the banks of the Missouri the privilege of building dykes and "wing dams" at their own expense to direct the current where it will do the least harm to their property. The bill as passed carries an appropriation of $23,000,000 and provides for works costing eventually more than sixty millions.

Kitchener Fails as Peace-maker. There is reason to believe that Gen. Kitchener's efforts to come to terms with his enemy in South Africa have been a complete failure. Whether or not the majority of the Boers are tired of war, as Mr. Winston Churchill, who is now lecturing in this country, says they are, evidently those who are conducting the campaign on that side do not want peace badly enough to make any effort to get it. The peace committees with which Gen. Kitchener has been dealing are made up of Boers who have surrendered and they count for little with those who are still under arms. De Wet has crossed the Vaal River into Cape Colony and is said to have a united force of 7,000 men (which is doubtful) to back up the former invasion. Cape Town is still being fortified, but it appears that the Boer invasion of Cape Colony is not likely to issue in any success in stimulating a rising of the Dutch, much less in reaching Cape Town. The most important engagement of the week was a British victory near Ventersburg.

The Wabash railroad has adopted a rule prohibiting the use of intoxicants by employes before reporting for duty or while on duty. It is not specified how long before reporting for duty the prohibition is intended to extend. We suggest about five years as a suitable interval. That will give time for the firm establishment of such a degree of habitual sobriety as is requisite to the safe transaction of railroad business.

The Disciples of Christ in the Twentieth Century.

We have still a few suggestions more to make concerning the probable direction of our development as a religious body during the twentieth century. As indicated in the first of these articles, we are stating what we believe ought to be the course of our progress in the conviction that what ought to be will be; that truth ultimately prevails.

We have no question but that there is to be wrought out among us during the twentieth century a more complete system, if we may so term it, of religious thought than we have hitherto taken time to think out. We have sometimes been misunderstood as being opposed to theology, but that would be absurd. Theology is our thought about God and His revelation. No intelligent person can be opposed to thinking on these high themes—the loftiest which can come within the range of the human intellect—or to the arrangement of this thinking in such a consistent whole as will give to each part its legitimate place and proportion of importance. What we have opposed and what we must continue to oppose, if we are true to the principles for which we have stood in the past, is the effort to make any such formulation of thought a basis of Christian fellowship and to give to it an official sanction and authority which has been given to the creeds of Christendom. This has been a great blunder of other religious bodies which the best thinkers of the world to-day now recognize. Nor do we believe that it is necessary or desirable to formulate after the manner of these creeds a system of theology, lest in time it might come to acquire a sort of authority over the conscience and intellect. What we do predict as a necessity of the future is the working out of these theological problems in books which shall set forth, in a more thorough fashion than has hitherto been done, the fundamental doctrines of Christianity from the point of view of the Reformation which we plead. It is not to our discredit that we have done so little in that direction in the past. We have had a theology which has served as a working basis in the past, while we were solving some of the practical problems which required immediate attention. The time may not even yet be here when we are prepared for such works as we have indicated, but it is sure to come, and such works will be certain to be produced. We are already having contributions in that direction and in due time there will be produced theological works which will take their place among the permanent contributions to theology. Such works will serve as preventives of that lop-sidedness in religious thinking, and that tendency to abnormal emphasis upon certain truths, with the neglect of others, which is more or less characteristic of every new religious movement. If our point of view is the right one, namely, that of making the mind of Christ the determinating factor in all religious problems, it follows that we ought to be able to produce theological works of superior value, which would overcome many objections to Christianity and open up the way for a more triumphant progress of the gospel and of the kingdom of God. That somewhere in the twentieth century such works will be produced, there can be no question in our mind.

Along with this ripening process in our theological thinking there is sure to come, if we mistake not, a corresponding development in organization. We use that term in its broadest sense to indicate all those methods and expedients by means of which religious thought and life seek to embody themselves and extend their influence throughout the world. The organization of our congregations for effective work will be carried to a higher degree of perfection both by the process of elimination and addition, so that all the functions of the local church—the teaching, the oversight, the training, care for the sick and the poor, evangelistic, etc.,—shall be discharged in a satisfactory manner. But, in addition to that, there will be a much more effective system of co-operation among the churches for caring for the weak and helpless congregations, and for pushing forward the evangelistic work in new fields. Perhaps this is the greatest lack among us to-day, aside from that whole-hearted consecration to the service of God which carries with it, potentially, all necessary reforms. We have succeeded better in almost everything that we have undertaken than in arranging a satisfactory system of superintendence and care of neglected churches, and providing them with necessary teaching and oversight in order to their development. At the present time we have a large number of small churches without regular pastoral oversight and instruction, and an equally large number of ministers who are without employment in the work to which they have dedicated their lives. A religious body that is afraid or unable to cope with a practical problem like this has great room for improvement. That such improvement will be made during this century, and we trust long before the middle of it is reached, we can scarcely doubt. It cannot be that we shall fail to develop a conscience as to our responsibility in caring for the weak congregations and the scattered members, and in perfecting our methods of co-operation so as to reach a larger number of the unsaved. The finger of God is pointing us steadily in the direction of better organization in these respects, and we cannot accomplish the work to which we have been called if we neglect so important a matter. The ghost of ecclesiasticism on the one hand, and an abnormal idea of independence, leading to practical congregational isolation on the other, are mainly responsible for the present state of things as respects the failure to shepherd and feed the pastoral flocks among us. These difficulties can and must be overcome, and the sooner they are overcome the better it will be for us.

At the risk of being charged with utopianism or excessive imagination, we venture to predict that, in the future, two changes will occur which will materially affect the question of pastorless churches and churchless pastors. One of these will be that churches will seek for men of long experience, and gray hairs will be at a premium. Churches that are now without regular preaching, and advertising for young men for one-fourth of their time, will be searching for elderly preachers who have passed the meridian of their strength and who would be content to preach on a small salary and give them the benefit of their wide experience and their deeper religious life. We predict this change because it is so sensible, so manifestly wise. We know of men who, to crown the closing years of their lives in the ministry, would be willing to preach for from $300 to $400 a year, because their children have married and left them and their expenses are small. How much better it would be for a church able to pay that amount to secure a man of established character and piety for his whole time than to secure the monthly or even semi-monthly visits of an absentee preacher! Not only will the weaker churches, however, be willing to avail themselves of the benefits of these elderly men, but our stronger city churches will insist on men of mature age, and a hoary head, if crowned by wisdom, will be no bar to a preacher's employment. Nothing, it seems to us, is more unnatural and irrational than the present prejudice against men who are in the very youth of old age, say from fifty to sixty, when the heart is young and the mind is active, and the body is capable of the necessary work connected with a preacher's calling. Because it is irrational it will not continue. The other change which we think is sure to come will be that young men, coming out of our colleges, having dedicated their lives to the ministry of the word, will close their ears to calls from city churches and will seek small congregations in the country, towns or hamlets where they will have time for study to prepare themselves for larger usefulness and where the churches are not able to pay large salaries. This would be an advantage to the churches, in enabling them to have a preacher for all his time, and to the preacher, who would have time to perfect his preparation, to brood over the things which he has learned and to develop an experience that will help him in larger undertakings. These two changes, both of which seem to us in the line of rational progress, would do much to assist in solving the problem to which we have referred. If they are right, the sooner these changes occur the better.

In a public address some weeks ago President Hadley, of Yale, expressed the opinion that "speaking broadly, lectures do a good deal less good than is popularly supposed. The work of diffusion of learning is mainly done, and on the whole better done, by the printing press." There are several reasons why it is true that people would rather learn from a printed page than from the spoken word. The great advantage of print, from the standpoint of the reader, is that if you don't like it you can leave it, or can at least skim and skip until you find something you do like; whereas, a speaker holds his audience by the law of courtesy even when he cannot hold them by eloquence or wisdom. Skipping and skimming may not be good intellectual discipline, but on the other hand nothing renders one more unsusceptible to good impressions than enforced attention to what one does not care to hear. It may be granted that the speaker exercises the power of his personality in a more direct manner than is possible to the writer; but this is not always an advantage. It depends on the personality. It is a distinct advantage to some men—good and wise men, too—to be able to hide their unimpressive personality behind a page of respectable print. The mechanical make-up of a paper or book corresponds to the "presence," bearing and elocution of a speaker, and the writer can find in his publisher an ally who will give to his thought a garb of physical beauty and charm which few speakers have at their command.

The United States Senate has recorded its opposition to the amendments of the Army Bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicants in the Philippines and the importation of liquors into those islands. The Senate has done itself no credit by this action. It is only another evidence that this body is too far removed from the people. Whatever opinion men may hold as to the advisability of maintaining saloons in this country, the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States is against the sale of intoxicants in the Philippines, where the devastating work of the saloons has already begun. A recently elected United States Senator celebrated his election by expending $20,000 for champagne in an evening's banquet. As long as it is possible for men of this type to buy their way into the United States Senate, we may expect the opposition of that body to such humanitarian measures as the amendment above referred to. The senators, however, who voted against the amendments ought to hear from their constituents on the subject in no unmistakable language. The appeal which is now being made to the President of the United States to exercise his high prerogative as Commander-in-Chief of the army in abolishing the saloons in the Philippines is worthy of his considerate attention, and such action on his part would meet with the universal approval of the moral element of the nation.

The injunction not to "talk shop" is a commonplace rule of social propriety which, if it did not originate with Chesterfield, might just as well have done so. Probably it is a good deal older—as old as the delusion that anything which is done for a living must be dull. The avoidance of shop-talk too often seems that one avoids those subjects which he knows something about and talks about those of which one knows nothing—and that is never interesting. Edward Everett Hale makes it one of his rules of conduct to "talk every day with a superior person." Most of us, perhaps, can find a superior more easily than Dr. Hale can. But after all the maxim only means that the other person must be superior in his knowledge of the subject about which you are talking. Any astronomer is my superior, if the subject is astronomy. Any lawyer is my superior, if our conversation turns upon law. Any farmer is my superior in a talk about farming. So it is not worth while to avoid talking shop—only, if possible, talk the other man's shop.

It is reported that a movement has been inaugurated by the Evangelical Alliance in Chicago to observe on March 4 a general day of prayer for the President and his administration. There are some, perhaps, who will consider this as a sort of vote of confidence or a resolution of indorsement, and will scarcely put their whole heart into their petition, but such an interpretation of the movement is quite gratuitous. Let all join in heartily. The less the President deserves such a favor, the more does he need it.

The Hearty Invitation.*

TEXT: We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you: come thou with us, and we will do thee good: for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.—Numbers 10:29.

This invitation was given by Moses to Hobab the Midianite, his father-in-law. The children of Israel were on their journey from Sinai to the Land of Promise. He had already received wise advice from his father-in-law and naturally desired on account of their relationship that he should share with Israel the promise of God's blessing. It may well serve as an invitation from Christians to-day to the unsaved.

A Pilgrimage.

We still have the life of faith in God presented in the form of a journey or a pilgrimage, as in the preceding lessons. Faith in God fixes a distinct destination and determines the course by which we reach it. It also separates us from all those having a different destination, traveling by different routes and inspired by different motives. Moses, through faith, received the promise of God made to Abram and Isaac and Jacob concerning the land of promise, and was guiding Israel thither. His invitation to his father-in-law was, "We are journeying unto a place of which the Lord said, I will give it you; come thou with us and we will do thee good." It was the faith of Moses that enabled him to see the national destiny of Israel and that caused him to extend this invitation to one in whom he was interested to share in its blessings. In a word, it was his faith that lay behind the journey that Israel was making through the wilderness to the land of Canaan. So it is our faith in Christ as the Son of God that lies behind all our Christian aims and efforts and determines our course through this life to the land that lies beyond.

The Invitation.

Notice first the ground of this invitation. "We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you." In other words, they were in the line of obedience to God; they were following the leading of God's providence. It is always safe, when we are walking in the way which God hath marked out for us, to invite our friends to go with us; not otherwise. Notice also the motive urged for accepting the invitation: "Come thou with us, and we will do thee good." The church of God makes this invitation and offers this inducement to-day. Unless persons accept Christ and come into the church with the understanding that they will be spiritually profited and made better men and women by so doing, they come with the wrong motive. We have known a few cases where persons came into the church with the feeling that while it would be no advantage to them, personally, it would be a great help to the church for them to unite with it. This is all wrong. The church can far better afford to do without any man, no matter how great or influential he may be, than he can afford to do without the church. Moses felt that it would be beneficial to his father-in-law to associate with people who believed in God and who were to be recipients of his guidance and blessing. It is a great thing to be thrown into association with pure men and women, who live and walk by faith in the invisible God. There is a heroism about such living that is contagious. Many a weak Christian has been saved by his association with others of stronger faith and character.

Leaning on the Promises.

The assurance which Moses felt that Hobab would be blessed by sojourning with him grew out of the fact that "the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel." In other words he was leaning on God's promise. We know now how God fulfilled His promise to Israel. But greater and richer are the promises made to Christians. There are, for instance, the promise of spiritual renewal, of forgiveness of sins, of the Holy Spirit, of a growing likeness with God, of continual fellowship with God, of redemption of the body, of everlasting life. The apostle Peter calls them "exceeding great and precious promises." Truly we who follow Christ can say to the world out of Christ, "Come thou with us and we will do thee good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel."

Who are Invited.

The prophet Isaiah indicates those who are invited when he says, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price" (Isaiah 55:1, 2). This harmonizes with the invitation of the Master Himself, who said, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." It harmonizes also with the invitation given by the Spirit and the bride, "Let him that is athirst come" (Rev. 22:17). The invitation is thus extended to all who feel their need of God and who hunger and thirst after righteousness. None so poor, none so wretched, none so sinful and degraded as to be excluded from the invitation if only there be the desire for righteousness.

How to Accept the Invitation.

"Incline your ear, and come unto me; hear and your soul shall live". . . . "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near; let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God for he will abundantly pardon" (Isaiah 55:3, 6, 7). Jesus said, in connection with His invitation, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me for I am meek and lowly in heart and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. 11:28-30). Jesus invites, the Spirit invites, the church invites, and "whosoever will let him come and partake of the water of life freely." Let us see to it that we are more diligent during this coming year in pressing this invitation upon our fellowmen than we have ever been before, and above all let us see to it that our lives are such as to be in themselves a constant invitation to others to share with us in the blessedness of the new life in Christ.

Prayer.

Almighty God, source of all life, of all love, and of all truth, we thank Thee that Thou hast called us by Thy prophets, by Thy apostles and by Thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord into fellowship with Thyself and into the joys and blessings of the great salvation. Having tasted the sweetness of Thy redeeming love in the knowledge of sins forgiven and in the possession of Thy Holy Spirit, may we be earnest in pressing the invitation of the gospel upon all those with whom we come in contact, and to so let our light shine before men that others may see our good works and be constrained to glorify our Father in heaven. In Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

It is a good thing for one to enrich and enliven the dull gray days of life by memories out of the past or anticipations of the future. What is man better than the dumb brutes about him if he possess no power to call up the richer experiences of the past, people his brain with the great thoughts of the great thinkers who have blessed the world, or by the royal gift of imagination put himself for the time in an ideal realm, where the highest dreams of the soul are fulfilled in actual conditions? It is not certain, indeed, that man is the only being who can thus transport himself into the past or the future, or from barren winter to budding spring. This morning while dressing we heard the note of a spring songster—just such as we heard in boyhood days in the thicket down by the branch when the dogwood blossoms were scenting the air. Was it thinking of budding trees, springing flowers and blue skies, and thus filling some of its dull hours with remembered joys of the past? Who knows?

Poverty is not an ideal condition of life in any form, but the most deplorable of all the kinds of poverty which curse the world is the poverty of the mind and of the soul. To be without a home of one's own, without a bank balance, without costly furniture, without what the world calls wealth, is not to be compared with the poverty of those who have no ideals above what they see about them, no lofty thoughts or noble aspirations, no hunger for knowledge, no love for reading, no taste for art, literature or music, except of the lowest type, which appeals to the sensual, no ambition to rise into the higher regions of their nature. This is the saddest of all the varieties of poverty, and it sometimes co-exists with the possession of property, just as mental and moral wealth often exists with very meager worldly possessions. Pity the poor and help them in every possible way; but let us especially pity and seek to help those who are paupers in ideas and bankrupt in moral ideals.

One of the signs of the poverty we have noted above is the indisposition to be alone, any time, which some people manifest. They have no company in their own thoughts or meditations, and shun the "quiet hour" as an enemy, lest it bring them face to face with conscience, whose accusing voice might be heard in the stillness of solitude. An enriched mind loves at times to be alone with its own thoughts. These are brooding moments, when the mind arranges and classifies its knowledge and reaches new combinations of ideas. It is so of the soul, indwelt and enriched by God's Spirit. It looks forward with delight to the quiet hour, when it may enter into communion with God and be stimulated, enlarged and purified by dwelling on His character, His will and His tender love. It is a small matter whether we be rich or poor in worldly goods; but life itself, here and hereafter, is made up of our intellectual and moral possessions.

Coming back to the thought with which we began, it is the person whose mind and heart are ennobled by loftly thoughts and by splendid moral ideals, who is best able, at any given time, to supplement the meagerness of his surroundings or neutralize the effect of undesirable conditions by calling to his aid the treasures of Memory and of Hope, the two good angels who are ever ready to minister to the souls of those who seek imperishable wealth. Education is better than mines of gold and silver, and to love truth, to love God and our fellowmen and to hunger and thirst after righteousness is more to be desired than diamond fields. These pass away, but those abide forever, as the soul's enfranchisement, admitting it into all that is true, beautiful and good, as its rightful inheritance.

Questions and Answers.

1. An elder calls for a letter to remove to another state, receives it, the vacancy in the eldership is filled, and after awhile the first elder returns and resumes his membership. Is he still an elder?

2. Whose business is it to look after disorderly members—the pastor or the elders?

E. W. Y.

1. He is not an elder until he be re-elected to that position, as the calling for a letter implied his resignation as elder, and the granting of the letter its acceptance?

2. The pastor is a part of the eldership, and it is their spiritual duty to look after the welfare of the members.

What is the meaning of the twentieth chapter of Revelation? A Reader.

We cannot attempt an exegesis of the entire chapter. It is a graphic picture in symbolic language of the triumph of righteousness, of the overthrow of evil and of the divine judgment upon men according to their works. The thousand years during which Satan is said to be bound, represents, perhaps, an indefinite period during which righteousness will triumph in the earth, to be followed by another demonstration on the part of Satan, and then his final overthrow.

Where was the Spirit of Christ during the time his body was in the tomb?

Frank Clary.

About the only light we have on that question is furnished by 1 Peter 3: 18-20, which seems to indicate that during this period "he went and preached unto the spirits in prison which aforetime were disobedient, when the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah while the ark was a preparing."

By whom, where and when was the first Sunday-shool organized? J. M. R.

The honor of introducing the Sunday-school work in modern times is credited to Robert Raikes, of Gloucester, England, who gathered the poor ragged children of the streets together on Sunday and employed teachers to teach them the rudiments of learning, including reading and the church catechism. He employed four teachers and gave them each one shilling a day. This occurred about 1780-1. While it is quite certain that John Knox founded Sunday-schools in Scotland about 1560, and that in the United States at Roxbury, Mass., there was a Sunday-school probably as early as 1674, yet it is probably true that the modern Sunday-school movement owes its origin to Robert Raikes' plan. Like all new movements, the Sunday-school met with fierce opposition at first on the part of religious people. But it has won its way to practically universal acceptance.

Is it in harmony with the Scriptures for a woman to take her place in the pulpit with the minister of the gospel through a protracted meeting, and open and close the meeting with a brief talk, and this with the desire of the pastor and congregation, she being a pure, consecrated Christian woman, fully capable of doing the work?

Mrs. Sarah Fisher.

We are unable to see anything unscriptural in this proceeding. It is simply a question of whether the course indicated was best for the success of the meeting. If the sister's talk was edifying and helpful to the meeting, and met with the approval of preacher and people, there is nothing to be said against it, so far as we can see. The right of women to participate in religious services and even to make public addresses in the interest of Christianity, is now almost universally recognized. There may be times and occasions when it would be expedient for her to waive this right in the interest of unity, just as we all should be willing to waive any privilege, when by doing so we can best promote the interest of the cause we love. But in the foregoing case there does not seem to have been anything inexpedient, even, in the proceeding.

What is the right course to pursue with an elder who takes the position that in Acts 20: 7, the disciples came together for the purpose of eating a common meal, and who refuses to commune with the church regularly and has been teaching the young converts that it is not necessary for them to observe the Lord's Supper each Lord's day, in consequence of which some have refused to do so? He has quite a following and threatens to divide the church if the church attempts to withdraw fellowship from him.

G. G. C.

The case stated above would seem to indicate that the elder is a schismatic. His opinion as to the meaning of Acts 20: 7 is against that of Bible scholarship, regardless of denominational lines. The fact, however, would probably have little weight with him, as that class of men are wiser in their own conceit than all the Bible commentators in the world. If he persists in perverting the minds of young converts and leading them to neglect their duty, refusing meanwhile to do his own duty, we see no other remedy than for the church to withdraw from him, not because of his opinion, but because of his disorderly conduct in producing strife and division in the church. His resignation as elder should be demanded at once, and if that does not prevent his evil work then severer measures should be resorted to. No one man should be permitted to destroy a church.

The Progress of Philosophy in the XIXth Century

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES, Ph. D.

Kant—The Problem of Knowledge.

When this century dawned it was in possession of the text of the Critical Philosophy of Immanuel Kant, but a long intellectual and spiritual discipline was necessary before the age could lay hold of the real message of that master spirit. The problem which Kant had inherited and which he transmitted was the problem of knowledge—knowledge of man, of nature and of God. From rationalism he received the attempted solution in terms of pure thought. It said: Sense perception is changeable, fickle; it varies with the condition of the organism, breeds illusion and obscures reality. Thought, on the other hand, as in mathematics, is universal, stable, verifiable, hence it alone is capable of yielding a knowledge of the nature of things. From empiricism he received the opposed statement that all knowledge arises through the senses and therefore is sensation. All real things are individual, colored, tasteful, tangible, audible, odorous. "Thought" gives only the shadow of the real world. General principles, laws, conceptions are not given in immediate experience and therefore their value is only derived, secondary. Kant, after profound reflection, rejected and accepted both Rationalism and Empiricism. He rejected both when taken separately, he accepted both as containing truths complementary to each other. His answer to both schools is: "Although all our knowledge begins with experience, it by no means follows that it all originates from experience."

Another sentence of similar import is, "Thoughts without perceptions are empty, perceptions without thoughts are blind." Kant thus insists upon these two elements in knowledge—the material furnished by the senses and the transforming activity of mind. Man cannot spin the world out of himself, neither can he discover a world of things stiff and stark outside of him. The only world he knows is one molded and stamped by his own activity. Things as we know them are a kind of factory product, and we never see the raw material, that is, the things in themselves. Or to use another figure, it is as though all people wore similarly colored glasses which they never could remove. They might then torment themselves by trying to discover what the world looked like to beings who wore no glasses or had a different kind! The century opened with just that question dominant in thought and in one form or another it has been the question for a hundred years. Can we know reality—ourselves, the universe and God? Kant answered, we can know only what is given in sensuous perception, therefore we cannot know the soul and God. But he was quick to assert that men must believe in them; faith in them is necessary to practical life, to ethical conduct. Kant said: "I had to remove knowledge in order to make room for faith."

Fichte, Schelling and Hegel.

Working upon Kant's problem, the leaders of the romantic school, Fichte, Schelling and Hegel, controlling German thought during the first half of the century, reached a completely idealistic position. It was different every way from the rationalism of the earlier period. Its great tenet was that the nature of the world is spiritual activity, intelligence. It is possible for man, himself a conscious, rational being, to know and participate in the absolutely real life of the universe. This participation is achieved in its highest form in intellectual reflection, insight. The world of nature and of human life and history reveals, does not conceal, God. Pursuing relentlessly the path of logic, exalting reason as the key to all mysteries, romanticism threw off the doubts of Kant and felt itself at one with eternal truth. The conception of man was placed in a new light, the history of human institutions was studied by Herder and Lessing as the progressive unfolding of the divine life in the race. Out of the enthusiasm of that search for the history of things, languages, literatures, lost civilizations were brought to light. Finally the demand for the history of the physical universe, of the earth and all her forms of life ushered in the modern scientific era.

Agnosticism and Pessimism.

Many influences conspired to cool the romantic fervor and concentrate all interest upon its latest product—the scientific spirit. Hegel, the greatest of the romanticists, using that term broadly, in his devotion to the dialectic of reason had seemed to reduce all life to a formula which was no doubt richly expressive to him, but became empty words to the succeeding age. The reaction from the extreme tension of "pure thought" and its high-sounding categories, found expression in two ways: first, in the matter-of-fact natural sciences and later in the conception of the world-power, not as intellect, but as will. The former was accompanied by agnosticism, the latter by pessimism. Agnosticism in its philosophical form made its appeal to one part of Kant's philosophy, the Critique of Pure Reason, and found an ally in the inherent empiricism of English thought. Kant had said, we cannot know anything not given in sense perception. Therefore, all we have a right to claim as demonstratively certain belongs to phenomena, to appearances, not necessarily to absolute reality. Now science works with phenomena and its apparent success in reducing vast fields of chaotic materials to law and system made it bold to discard anything not yielding to its test-tubes and retorts as superstition and 'vain philosophy.' The epoch-making work of Darwin in the establishment of evolution by a process of natural selection, furnished the opponents of traditional theology with a deadly weapon.

But at the close of the nineteenth century agnosticism has been disarmed. Science has become conscious that many of her assumptions, such as atoms, energy, mass, natural selection, need reconsideration. Professor Ward's great work on "Naturalism and Agnosticism" has opened a discussion which promises to issue in the complete downfall of materialistic atheism.

At the same time religion has recovered from the shock it felt in the loss of many of its trappings and has found that science and criticism have only been preparing for a firmer faith. In literature a more believing, though a simpler and more practical, religious spirit is appearing. Pessimism had its modern prophet in Arthur Schopenhauer. But the deepest thing in Schopenhauer was not his gloom, his nightmare rage at the suffering of life, however justifiable much of that may be. The insight which assures him a place in the progress of the century was that by which he saw that will is more fundamental than thought. He conceived it, however, as a capricious, blind, irrational will. Hence his pessimism. Change his adjectives and you have a positive statement which already promises a new romanticism, but more enduring. The term will is used here in a broad sense. Applied to the individual it includes many unconscious elements, such as impulse, instinct, activity. It appears at its best in organized habits which have grown up in response to some elemental desire or craving of the higher nature. Knowledge is viewed as an instrument of the will and therefore as secondary and dependent in a sense.

Philosophy more Practical.

This conception of life as essentially will is bringing reflective thought more into the service of practical ends. All the scholastic discussions of essences, pure being, etc., have lost their importance, not because the questions have been solved but because they are felt to be meaningless and unprofitable. Philosophy is to-day occupied more with ethical and sociological problems. For example, a royal line of thinkers from Herbart down have turned the whole force of their thinking toward the great field of education. Consequently a quiet but tremendous revolution is going on in the school systems of the world. Similarly men are working at the problems of religion as a social agency,and a new theology and a better is already promised. Until it is achieved many crude, ephemeral religious sects and revivals of oriental vagaries have their day. They gain a following sometimes because of their novelty, often because they partially embody the true spirit of the age. William Hamilton said: "No problem has arisen in theology which did not first emerge in philosophy." If theology and religion are to embody the results of nineteenth century thought they will be comprehensive enough to include what is true in Christian Science and Theosophy, as well as the essentials of more orthodox faiths. The search for truth in the cycle just passed has been more strenuous, more symmetrical than in any previous time. As a result philosophy is more idealistic in conception, more scientific in temper, more practical in consequences than ever before. In the future philosophy and theology may once more be united, not by the subjection of either, but by free interaction and mutual support.

How to Study the Writings of John.*

By W. W. Sniff.

John was the author of a larger number of the books of the New Testament than any other writer except Paul. The Gospel according to John, the Epistles bearing his name, and Revelation, are the five books to be credited to him. No part of the Scriptures is richer in spiritual instruction or more precious, by reason of the promises contained, than these of John. As an aid in appropriating the truth recorded by this writer, a few considerations will be found suggestive.

1. John's writings must be studied in the light of his intimate acquaintance with Jesus. The chief reason Jesus had in choosing twelve out of the large number who were about him, was that he desired to give them opportunity to know him as well as possible. John had the advantage, therefore, possessed by the Twelve, of personal acquaintance with the Lord. His was the advantage of the eyewitness. He could say, "We speak the things which we have seen and heard." But beyond the opportunity which John had in common with the Twelve, he had the peculiar advantage of being one of the three whom Jesus chose out of the little band to take into the innermost circle of his glory. With Peter and James, John saw the Savior in the chamber of death (Mark 5: 37); in the glory of the Transfiguration (Matt. 17: 1); and in the agony of Gethsemane (Matt. 26: 37). It could not well have been otherwise with the one who was to disclose to us the Master's inner life, as John was to do. But beyond even this, John had the distinction of being the "one Jesus loved" (John 20: 2). Does it not follow that the love was mutual? This also was an advantage to John. We say, "Love is blind," but like many other proverbs this is not more than half true. Love sees with a vision clear and splendid a great many things otherwise unseen. It is John, therefore, who ushers us into the innermost chamber of the Master's life.

2. The writings of John must be studied in the light of the times when he wrote. His writings are the latest of the books of the New Testament. It is likely that all the other books were written several years before the earliest of John's was produced. Tradition tells us that John lived to be very old, about a century, that his last years were spent at Ephesus, and that he was the only one of the Twelve who died a natural death. There are many good reasons for believing this to be true. Other writings which constitute our New Testament had had time for free circulation among the churches, and John had probably seen many, if not all, of them. Possessed as he was of a sweet, full memory of the Master's ministry, did John come to believe there were facts and teachings of importance which the others had not recorded, which he ought to write? A beautiful tradition tells us that when John was a very old man, and when it became apparent to his brethren, the elders of the church at Ephesus, that he could not live long, they besought him to write for them in permanent form what he had many times told them orally. He consented to go into retirement three days for meditation, that he might decide whether to write. When he returned to them he made a record for them which we have as John's contribution to our knowledge of the Savior, the Gospel according to John.

There are good reasons for believing that Revelation was written not far from the time of the awful destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in 70 A. D., which had been graphically foretold by Jesus, in which more than a million Jews perished. While some hold to the opinion that the book was written much later and was a picture of the future centuries, there are many points of evidence in favor of the earlier date, and an application to John's own time, when the wicked Nero was emperor of Rome and the most terrible destruction was coming upon the Jews who had rejected Jesus, and involving many Christians in the bloody and indiscriminating persecutions. If this view is correct, John clothed his message in these striking figures so that those for whom it was intended should understand, and others, unwilling to take pains to discover its hidden meaning, should pass it by. Otherwise, while encouraging the Christians in severe trial, the plain, literal message might only increase the danger to them by aggravating the wrath of the persecutors.

Sufficient difference of opinion exists on the part of the best scholars in regard to the chronology and meaning of this book to keep us from being mechanical or unkindly positive in our interpretation. But underlying all speculations and theories about Revelation, there is a residuum of certainty. The book is highly figurative; the figures are borrowed from war, persecution and destruction. The pretext is the need of the Christians; the purpose is encouragement. The theme is victory; the key-word is "overcometh." Whether its application was immediate or remote, it is yet a grand book, helpful and inspiring to the church.

The First Epistle of John cannot be understood without remembering that it was written at Ephesus near the close of the first century when idolatry and Gnosticism were poisoning society and life. The Epistle was written to insist upon holding steadfastly the true faith. Ephesus had long been exceedingly idolatrous. John does not so much argue the questions at issue between idolatry and Christianity as insist in the strongest declarations upon faith in the Father and the incarnate Son. The first four verses are a blow at these idolatrous tendencies, and the letter closes with the gentle entreaty, "My little children, guard yourselves from idols."

Another powerful and pernicious error with which John deals in the First Epistle without naming it is Gnosticism. The Gnostics were saying that there could be no sin, since every experience of the body, however shameless and impure, would increase the mind's store of knowledge, which was a good; John said: "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves." They were saying that all material was vile, the body worthless; John declared that "Jesus Christ the Son of God had come in the flesh." They held to the supremacy of knowledge; John insisted upon fellowship with God through a pure life. Not to have knowledge, but to "do righteousness," was the test of true living. "All unrighteousness is sin."

The Second and Third Epistles are letters to individuals, the first to "the elect lady," some Christian woman, warning her against certain false teachings; the other to "Gaius the beloved," commending to his kindness and hospitality some Christians who were strangers where Gaius lived.

3. The Gospel of John must be studied in the light of the purpose stated in chapter 20, verse 31. There is, to be sure, much in the Gospel by John that is unrecorded by the other three, and he mentions only six miracles performed by Jesus. He introduces many discourses not elsewhere written, such as the one to Nicodemus, the one to the Samaritan woman, those on the Bread of Life, the Light of the World, the Good Shepherd, and the most precious of all, the interview with his disciples in the upper room during the last hours. Yet all these are in entire harmony with John's purpose, and the arrangement and subject matter seem to show that John selected the material and planned the book in order to lead up to the climax contained in Thomas' cry, "My Lord and my God!" This purpose can be seen in the miracles and discourses, all of which beautifully exhibit the divine life in the person of Jesus. More than the other writers, John, the disciple who "reclined in Jesus' bosom" at the last Supper, reveals to us the inner life of Jesus, the Son of God. The narrative of the other three "is chiefly composed of His manifold and ceaseless dealings with men; in John we have rather His tranquil and unbroken union with his Father. The heavenly element which forms the background of the first three Gospels is the atmosphere of the fourth."

The purpose John had was not only that we might "believe" but also that we "might have life." The way to study the Gospel by John is the way that will lead us most surely and unerringly to this purpose, and put us in possession of that knowledge which is life eternal (John 17: 3).

Evolution at Bartlett's Landing.

By Burris A. Jenkins.

CHAPTER III.

But we have nothing to do with all this. Our story must leap forward four years into the distance. Four years had the widowed mother aged; four years had the white thickened on the Elder's brow and beard; four years had Bartlett's Landing and its meeting house seen marriage and giving in marriage, death and birth, and the building of new homes; four years had Jane grown into the twenties and the ripest, richest, fullest womanhood.

Sunset on the river once again, this time at the close of a blazing Sunday in July. The coolness of evening already had begun to freshen in the air, the western sky was bright but soft, like mother-of-pearl in the firelight. A breeze from off the wide plains that reach out to the Rockies fanned the forehead of the Elder as he stood by the river brim. A perfect hush filled all around, save for the quiet twittering of the half-sleeping birds in the trees above.

Hushed, too, was the little group of fourscore "Disciples" standing on the river bank, while the old man, in long black coat and bearing a staff, walked deliberately and firmly into the stream. Sounding here and there with his staff, he seemed at last content, and turned back to the shore. Several young men and women stepped down to meet him, and as he took two of them by the hand, leading them into the water, voices on shore lifted a song upon the evening air:

"Just as I am without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me."

When the three stood to their waists in water the song was hushed while the voice of the old man, strong as in youth, floated out under his upraised hand and over the gurgling water in a prayer.

This ended, he laid his arm in fatherly fashion about the shoulders of a youth, while he solemnly pronounced these words: "By the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, I baptize thee, my son, into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

Instantly in a sort of triumph, as the youth was buried in the waters and rose again, the song burst forth under the leadership of a strong contralto:

"Just as I am, though tossed about,
With many a conflict, many a doubt."

Still lower sank the sun, and the last had been baptized, when some one stepped to the side of the leader of song. Her voice lost all control for a moment, while a flush, deeper than she had known for four full years, mantled her face. Instantly she recovered, and the song arose for the last lines:

"Just as I am, thy love unknown,
Has broken every barrier down!"

The quick eye of the old man had not failed to mark the new-comer and, still standing in the water, he calmly said:

"Bro. Henry Winfield, pronounce the benediction."

"Grant, Lord, that these who have died, we trust, to self and sin, and have been buried in the likeness of our Savior's death, may rise to-day to newness of life, in some sort pure and strong as his; and on us all may the peace of God rest, as the sunlight rests upon the stream, through all our lives and unto endless years. Amen!"

As they pressed round him to learn the details of his opportune arrival, he told how his boat had panted all the hot day up the river at low water, winding in and out among sand-bars, until in the afternoon she had stuck on a mud-bank in the middle of the stream, four miles below; how he had been paddled ashore and had walked the thirsty miles through the woods to Bartlett's. Of course he was asked to preach that night, and of course he could not decline.

In the short time till early candlelight it became noised about that Henry had returned and a considerable audience gathered to hear him. The Elder, seated in the pulpit, gazed with ill-concealed pride, first upon the young man and then upon the faces of his neighbors. All these years he had looked forward to this moment. The old man wished that all the county were present, but his regret at the comparatively small gathering was more than counterbalanced by the ardor of his anticipation.

Henry sat in great trepidation. Not that he feared the audience. He had preached at Wheeling and Pittsburg and Washington, and even in the presence of the great Campbell himself; the leader of the "Reformation" had pronounced his preaching good, and sent him forth with blessing. But he feared one man in that audience, one man whom he loved as a father and whose daughter was his promised bride. Henry knew how his own views were altered. He knew how, even in Campbell's college, and under that great man's kindly influence, he had been misunderstood by many of his fellows and branded traitor to his church. Campbell, however, appreciated him, and had said to him on the last of his days in Bethany, "Winfield, I understand your positions far better than the brethren will. With most of them I agree. On some of them we differ. But I love you enough to differ from you calmly; as, indeed, I love all men enough. Amongst the churches, however, you will often be misunderstood; so that at first, until you become established, you will needs be wise as a serpent, harmless as a dove."

Henry had thought to take the advice of "Bishop" Campbell, as he was half-playfully, half-lovingly called; but, brooding over the matter on the long days and nights of his journey, he had decided to grasp the nettle at the beginning and have the fight over with, saying to himself, "I cannot dissemble. I cannot dissemble." Well for him if he had heeded the counsel of age and been careful that first night!

All men agreed, when he stood up to speak, that no man had ever better graced a public platform. Tall and broad, with full gold-brown beard, thick hair, rather long, in the fashion of the day, curling and clustering round his head and neck, his was the face and figure of a youthful Jove. A slight stoop of the shoulders, that some had noted as a mark of his four years of studentship, disappeared as he arose. He lifted his massive head and his voice rolled rich like an organ.

He took as text, "God hath not left himself without witness in any nation." He spoke of the value of ancient religions, of the light of Athens and Rome, and even the farther Orient. He seemed at home in the lore of many religions. He had evidently read and thought before he spoke. He declared that God had, through all the ages, an increasing purpose running; that high thought and noble aspirations had marked many times and peoples; that light was ever struggling up through darkness, and that our attitude toward all seekers after God should be one of tolerance and even appreciation. Socrates and Antigone, Confucius and Buddha, all should be known and tested, not by their systems, however important beliefs may be, but by their noble lives. God would so test them and save them, nay had saved them while they were yet living.

He gave the last half of his sermon to the Christian religion, showing how in the struggle of faith the fittest was to survive. The Scriptures were fearlessly to be tested in the crucible of scientific and literary criticism, not worshiped as a fetich. Things were true, not because the Bible said them—but the Bible said them because they were true. The Christian faith should triumph because of its reasonableness. And because of the Master's sweetness and strength at the name of Jesus every knee should bow and every tongue confess. The mind that was in Christ should, therefore, be in us all, and our lives be filled with his abundant life.

The sermon was such as would be accepted by almost any enlightened congregation of to-day; but in Bartlett's opinion it was confusion worse confounded. Throughout its delivery his face grew longer and sterner, and at its close he had never a word to say. As far as possible Henry was a scientific student; Jane's father was a blind believer. Henry questioned everything and subjected all to the test of reason; her father accepted without question the literal words from Genesis to Revelation and even the traditions of interpretation. Henry was an evolutionist; her father abhorred the word. Henry was a disciple of German critical schools; her father had heard faintly that Germany was a hot-bed of infidelity.

Jane saw the drift of things. She recognized the theological gulf that yawned between her father and her promised husband, and knowing both she could hope for no compromise.

Sins of Omission.

By Andrew Scott.

There is no surer evidence of sin than the fact of distorted vision. Very forcibly is this truth stated in the text: "The Lord seeth not as man seeth." Samuel was influenced by the outward appearance of the sons of Jesse, but God saw the heart.

This is an oft repeated human blunder not only in viewing and contrasting persons, but in measuring different aspects of character in the same person. We look at certain quiet lives in a community as more nearly ideal than any other in it, when from God's view point these may be the most dangerous lives and all the more so that the world considers them safe and worthy. Their sins are those of omission and less noticed by humanity. Jesus in his teaching has clearly presented to our vision this form of sin. The sin of Dives is not that he cursed or kicked poor Lazarus who lay at his gate full of sores. Nothing of this sort is intimated. Passing from his mansion to his carriage day after day he neglected the unfortunate. He failed to minister to the needy, suffering man at his gate, and for this sin he afterward lifted up his eyes in torment.

Jesus says it is because "ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me." Not that he seeks to palliate aggressive sin, for sin in any form is never to be condoned, but full well Jesus understood the necessity of calling attention to and of emphasizing the enormity of the sins of omission, because of the proneness of humanity to thus sin, and fail for the time to be duly impressed with a proper sense of guilt. This is one reason why this form of sin is so dangerous. So many are unconscious of their guilt, and when awakened, the cost of making correction is often very great. The rich young man went away sorrowful and failed to escape guilt in consequence. The Savior turned his searchlight upon that young man's life and it was found wanting, not so much because of what he had done that was wrong as because of what he had not done and was even then unwilling to do though the Master showed him his duty and privilege.

Does not this same searchlight show us our sin? Why are we so slow to preach the gospel to every creature? The team needs enthusiasm as well as the driver. The driver should only be needed to properly direct the energies of his horses. So if we are willing-hearted in the Lord's work our pastors and missionary secretaries will only need to direct our energies instead of shouting themselves hoarse and goading us to energy. What a sad story can be told of neglected churches everywhere. The loyal and faithful few are ever to be found engaged in the various services of the church; but what of the masses of professed Christians? Indifference and neglect are the words which best describe their conduct when no stronger terms are needed. That word neglect covers a multitude of sins. It is at the root of many sins of commission.

Is it not because we neglect private devotion and the family altar and the word of God that we become aggressive in sin and also fall short of the prayer-meeting, Sunday-school, church service and world-wide missions? The revival needed to-day is one that will lead us to a soul-searching and personal examination of self before God, with his word wide open and our hearts and lives laid bare. Pause! Withdraw from the world awhile. Enter into communion with God. Have an interview with Jesus and from such view point look at sin and its consequences, especially the sin of indifference or neglect. Then read again the commission and in his name endeavor to meet its requirements. When we all set ourselves to earnest, consecrated service, the church will no longer be neglected. Missionary secretaries will be fully occupied directing wisely the free-will offerings we put in their hands to adequately work the home and foreign fields. Tarrying in the upper chamber at Jerusalem in communion with God set the hearts of the early Christians on fire and they had a consuming zeal in the cause they loved more than life. We assert again that this is the revival the church of to-day needs, and to this end let us pray and preach.

A White House Reception

By EDWARD B. BAGBY

Ex-Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

The first mistress of the White House was Mrs. Abigail Adams, wife of the second president of the United States. In a letter to her daughter written in 1800 she gives an interesting account of her arrival in Washington, her first impressions of the place and the discomforts of her residence in the newly constructed President's house. She praises the location of the home and enjoyed the view of the river and the ships passing to and from Alexandria but there was little else to commend.

She complains of the difficulty in keeping the great house warm, "though surrounded by forests, wood is not to be had."

"The house is upon a grand and superb scale and the lighting of the apartments from kitchen to parlours is a tax indeed."

"Bells are wholly wanting, not one being hung through the whole house." "The house is made habitable but there is not a single apartment finished. We have not the least fence, yard or other convenience without, and the great unfinished audience room I made a drying room of, to hang up the clothes."

On the way to a recent President's reception I thought of the changes wrought in a hundred years. At the time of its construction the White House was the most magnificent private dwelling in the country and the enemies of the administration sarcastically referred to it as the "President's Palace." Now it is considered mean and insignificant and in spite of its sacred associations must give place soon to a mansion of more spacious and stately proportions.

Mrs. McKinley does not complain of any lack of heat, light or bells. Communication is not only established between the various rooms but bells can be made to ring and instruments to click in any part of the world.

What a transformation in the East Room! We view the soft, velvet carpet, handsome mirrors, artistic mural decorations, mantels adorned with glorious azaleas and roses and delicately tinted hyacinths, banks of towering palms and festoons of smilax entwining the gorgeous chandeliers, and wonder that this room could ever have been used for so base a purpose as a drying place for the family wash.

The most popular social functions at the Executive Mansion are the card receptions given each year in honor of the Diplomatic Corps, the Congress of the United States, the Judiciary and the Army and Navy, in the order named. As early as eight o'clock the carriages begin to arrive and soon form a line which extends the whole course of the semicircular driveway and some distance down Pennsylvania Avenue. Of the two thousand guests who enter, very few are asked to show their cards.

A new administration causes many changes in the various departments in Washington but rarely is there a change in the personnel of the White House force. The veteran doorkeepers are acquainted with the members and attaches of the foreign legations, the heads of the departments and the elite of the city. The uniform of the officers of the army and navy proclaims their rank.

As the Congressmen have no distinctive dress and many of them are new men, one of the special employees of the House of Representatives is assigned to assist the doorkeeper, to prevent any possible embarrassment. When the new member from Wayback approaches, although he may not have so much shirt front and his wife more dress waist than is customary on such occasions, the man from the Capitol nods "O. K." to the doorkeeper and they are graciously welcomed.

Having checked our wraps, we take places in the line which is moving slowly toward the receiving party. The distance is not great but it takes us fifty-five minutes to make it.

It is a good-natured crowd about us and we have ample time to inspect the rooms through which we pass. We notice the jeweled glass screen in the vestibule, the simplicity of the private dining room, look along the grand corridor into the conservatory from which come the fragrant odors of the orchids and the sweet strains of the Marine Band. We find ourselves now in the splendid state dining room and look for the handsome set of cut glass which consists of five hundred and twenty pieces, and every piece engraved with the coat of arms of the United States. But we will have to take the authority of the guide-books or wait until the President invites us to a state dinner.

In the Red Room we find an interesting group of portraits. Benjamin Harrison and Mrs. Harrison, Mrs. Tyler and Mrs. Hayes look gravely upon us. The portrait of Mrs. Hayes is by Huntingdon and was presented by the ladies of the W. C. T. U. in recognition of her efforts in banishing intoxicating liquors from the White House table. At last we reach the Blue Room where the receiving party is stationed.

An army officer makes the introduction. The President gives a cordial handshake and says, "I am glad to see you." Mrs. McKinley, upon whose face are the traces of suffering, from her invalid's chair greets us with a gracious smile. The crowd is surging on in the rear and we are hardly given time to distinguish the ladies of the Cabinet. Neither do the ushers allow us opportunity to admire the handsome tapestried walls and ceiling, see the exact spot where President and Mrs. Cleveland were married or meet some of the guests who have been invited behind the line.

We pass through the Green Room to the spacious East Room and there pause before the handsome Stuart portrait of Washington to recall the one pleasant episode of the disastrous invasion of the British to the Capital City in 1814. President Madison, possessed of discretion, whatever may be said of his valor, had retired to a place of safety. His wife, bold, if not so discreet, declared that she would not allow the threats of the invading British to interfere with the grand dinner for which she had arranged.

The house was decorated, tables spread and the guests were about to be seated when a messenger announced that the enemy had reached the Capitol. The panic-stricken guests rushed from the house but Mrs. Madison refused to leave until she had cut from its frame this large portrait of Washington and arranged for its conveyance to some place of safety. The British upon entering the President's house were sorry to miss the opportunity of destroying the portrait of the arch rebel but it is said found consolation in the steaming dinner on the table and the cooling wines on the sideboard.

While we are surveying the dazzling scene in the East Room the time has passed quickly and the hands of the clock point to eleven. The hour has arrived for the receiving party to retire. To the stirring strains of the Marine Band, the President and Mrs. McKinley lead the way from the Blue Parlor, accompanied by the Cabinet officers and their families, and pass through the East Room and Grand Corridor to the private apartments where a supper is spread for the favored guests.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

What do I know about "The Universal Cyclopedia?"

I know, in the first place, that it is not "universal," in any legitimate sense of the word. Such a thing is impossible in any book.

I know of nothing better than "The Universal Cyclopedia" for the price. It is published by D. Appleton & Co., New York. The work contains twelve volumes of more than six hundred pages each, and each page has two broad columns. "The Universal Cyclopedia" is "Johnson's Cyclopedia," revised, variously improved and brought down to date. Some of the articles treat of events belonging to 1898 and even, I think, '99. This is as near to date as such a work can be made. Charles Kendall Adams, President of the University of Wisconsin, is the editor-in-chief. He had the co-operation of the best men in the country in the preparation of the work. Specialists were employed in different departments. The maps are especially fine. Almost all articles are signed. There are, in the beginning of each volume, the names of the contributors with a word concerning the official position, or work, of each. A good account of the Disciples of Christ is given by J. H. Garrison—of whom you may have heard. There is a brief sketch of the life of Alexander Campbell and of Isaac Errett by the same writer. "The Universal Cyclopedia" will tell you who J. H. Garrison is, and a few of the many good things that he has done.

The Cumberland Presbyterians originated, about the same time, in the same part of the world, and they came as one result of the same great religious revival as the Disciples of Christ. The Cumberland Presbyterians number 180,192; the Disciples number 1,149,982. The Disciples of Christ gained last year 31,586 members; the Cumberland Presbyterians lost 6,390. More than twice as much space is given in "The Universal Cyclopedia" to the Cumberland Presbyterians as is devoted to the Disciples of Christ. Why? I do not know.

In Vol. VIII there is an article, excellent, in the main, on missions. On pp. 164-5 are given the names of the "most important" missionary "societies" in "the order of establishment," with their fields of work.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society was organized, as you know, in 1875, and is at work in India, Japan, China, Turkey, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, England, Africa, Cuba and Hawaii. The Cumberland Presbyterian Missionary Society was organized in 1876 and is at work in Japan and Mexico. The first-named society is not mentioned in "The Universal Cyclopedia;" attention is called, in the proper place, to the society last named. "The Universal Cyclopedia" knows nothing of the American Christian Missionary Society, organized in 1849—a society that has spent more than two millions of dollars in the evangelization of the United States and Canada and has organized hundreds of churches. This also was the first Protestant missionary society to enter Porto Rico at the close of the Spanish-American war. "The Universal Cyclopedia" has this, Vol. VIII, p. 165:

"1849, Foreign Christian Missionary Society (Disciples, U. S): Turkey, India, Japan, China."

I need not tell you how accurate this statement is. The article on "Missions" is signed E. M. Bliss.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions, in some respects the most important woman's missionary society in the world, a society working in the home land and in lands beyond the seas, doing also an educational work from the kindergarten school to the university, an organization that has done more to solve the problem relating to the moral and spiritual training of students in State Universities than any other organization in existence; a society collecting and disbursing more than a hundred thousand dollars a year, and employing one hundred and six missionaries, is not named in the list of the "most important" missionary societies. Why? I do not know. Who is to blame? I do not know. I do not blame any person. You requested me to say in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST what I know about "The Universal Cyclopedia," and I am telling you some of the things that I know—this is all.

Now that my mind is on the subject of missions, have you noticed that more and more the evangelization of the world is receiving respectful attention in the leading magazines and the really great newspapers? There is an article in the January number of "The American Monthly Review of Reviews" on "Foreign Missions in the Twentieth Century" by Edmund F. Merriam.

Mr. Merriam begins by saying that "the nineteenth century has been the century of Foreign Missions. In the history of the Christian Church it will be known as peculiarly the period of the Christian crusade in pagan lands. Its distinguishing religious characteristic is the large number of men and women who have gone forth from Christian lands to propagate the gospel among peoples of all nations," and then proceeds to enumerate the "lessons established by the experience of the last century." Some of the "lessons" are:

1. "The evangelization of every nation must be done chiefly by its own people."

2. "The necessity of self-support and self-reliance in the native churches has been acknowledged in the closing years of the nineteenth century."

3. "Christian missions will increasingly take the form of sympathy and aid to the churches in foreign lands."

4. "Missionaries will be more and more selected for educational and administrative rather than preaching abilities."

5. "Evangelistic tours in pagan lands by preachers and lecturers from Christian countries will increase in number and frequency."

But I beg your pardon. Doubtless you have read Mr. Merriam's article. The foregoing are, you remember, some of his "lessons."

I wonder if, as you passed the twenty-eighth day of last December, you remembered that it was the one hundredth anniversary of the baptism of Krishna Pal, by William Carey? Krishna Pal was the first Hindoo convert. He was a carpenter. Nov. 25, 1800, he broke his arm. Dr. John Thomas, one of Carey's men, was called to attend him. As he did so he spoke to his patient of sin and its remedy. The carpenter with a broken arm was won to Christ. He became a valuable servant of our Lord. Dr. Thomas preceded Carey to India, not, however, in the first place, as a missionary. Seventeen years he had spent in that interesting land. Carey had been there seven years. Krishna Pal was the first convert to the Christ. Dr. Thomas was so overpowered by emotion that brain fever resulted and for a time he was wildly delirious. See what God hath wrought in India since that December day in the year 1800!

Dr. Parker as Sheldon.

The great feat accomplished by Mr. Sheldon at Topeka created immense interest in England. So did Mr. Sheldon's visit to this country. Now we are seeing some of the remarkable results. Mr. Sheldon did not give us as a nation a very good character. Some of his strictures were just enough; some seemed to be the result of too superficial an experience to form a reliable criterion for severe judgment. Great nations are not to be understood by observations made during a hop, skip and jump. We are nothing like the people Mr. Sheldon imagines us to be. If he could live here a few years he would write about us in a totally different accent. I hope Mr. Sheldon will come again. He is a great favorite with us all, as every good American is. I am aware that I am myself somewhat misunderstood by some excellent American readers, because I have made one or two frank objections to certain hasty splashes with the black brush which Mr. Sheldon so freely used. Still, I did but affirm the fact of the matter. However, now I am impressed with the new proof of the influence of Mr. Sheldon's newspaper campaign at Topeka. Dr. Parker, the greatest pulpit power in the world at this time, has been induced for one week to undertake the editorial supervision of a London evening organ, the "Sun."

The New Sunshine.

I, for one, am very glad that this tribute is paid to Mr. Sheldon. He deserves it. It shows that the sensation which he caused was not a mere ripple of the moment, and it shows how great is the attention which Britain pays to America. The Topeka papers issued by Mr. Sheldon were sold by thousands in London. They were all reprinted here. I read them with the greatest admiration. And now I am thankful for this new departure of the "Sun." Of course it may be said that the proprietors of that evening paper are merely making an astute move in the way of advertising their journal. But the public cannot analyze motives. They have to do with the living issues alone. Well, Dr. Joseph Parker has produced the first three evening numbers, and he has done well. Somewhat needlessly, I think, he went a little out of his way to assure us all that he was not emulating or imitating Mr. Sheldon. It is true that he is not exactly adopting all Sheldon's methods; but I do not believe that he would ever have been called to this week's duty but for the precedent set by the Topeka evangelist. The difference is a simple one. Sheldon eliminated much more than Parker. The former published no records of crime, and no theatrical advertisements. But the latter gives full space to all sorts of criminal doings, even murders and divorces; and the "Sun" is still this week filled with the usual quantity of theatrical advertisements and even those of Lipton's stores, where wines and spirits are sold as well as provisions. Dr. Parker says: "I want to see what is being done. If a crime is committed I want to see all about it. This is what the public will demand." So the "Sun" under Parker is really in the fullest sense a newspaper, which the Topeka journal was not, under Sheldon. "I do not believe in tracts, huge or daily," says Dr. Parker. He regarded Sheldon's paper as simply a huge daily tract, not as a newspaper at all. Thus, the two parson-editors greatly differ in their notions of procedure.

Christ and the Press.

The whole idea of these editorial innovations springs from a cause over which we should all rejoice. The influence of the pulpit may not seem to be as direct as in former times, but it is in reality much more powerful in its indirect impact on society. Christianity is sapping and mining all the social system. The world has rejected and crucified the Christ, but the risen Savior is conquering. The Christ of history dominates the councils of men. The heathen nations are succumbing on all sides to the Christian peoples. The parliaments are compelled to give to the pleas for the interests of humanity. Christ has uplifted the poor. France opened her late Exposition without any acknowledgement of the Almighty. This was the first time that a Great Exhibition has been thus atheistically inaugurated. And the Exposition, with all its wonder and glory, has been blighted. It was a failure. Every institution which exiles the Deity is failing. Instinctively this law of the necessity of the Divine Presence is affecting the vast press of the world. The power of the Christian Church is after all the truly imperial power in the earth. It will master the press, the parliaments, the arts and sciences and all the resources of the wisdom of men. When the proprietors of a popular journal, either in America or England, solicit experimentally the services of some eminent minister, they furnish us with one of the most significant tokens of the tendencies of the times. Those tendencies are all in harmony with the purposes of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth.

The War Not Finished.

I have no politics. That is to say, I am not a politician. But I study political subjects with intense interest from a Christian point of view. I never approve of any war. No Christian man can ever endorse any apologies and excuses for any war. And yet, till the nations are actually Christian, as well as nominally so, they will be, alas, apt to drift into conflict. Lord Roberts lately announced that the war was over. Technically it is so; but that is all. The guerrilla stage of this deplorable contest will last for some time. There was to have been a thanksgiving service in St. Paul's Cathedral on the arrival of Lord Roberts in London; but the authorities have abandoned the idea, seeing that a doxologizing over the termination of the war would be premature. On the demerits and the merits of this war it is useless to argue. The only thing that the British Government is able to do is to persevere to the end, and to make the most generous possible terms with the Boers. That seems to be the general desire. Home Rule is the universal system in the whole British Empire except in Ireland. And, whether my American readers can believe it or not, Home Rule would long since have been given to Ireland but for the malign and fatal influence of Irish Popery.

Another Valuable Export to America.

The most eloquent of my neighbors is Mr. Campbell Morgan, pastor of the Congregational church at Tolington Park, North London. This famous young minister, for he is only 36 years of age, has sprung into eminence in a remarkably brief space of time. He was a schoolmaster in Wales. Little Wales is the most wonderful nursery in the world of great ministers. Mr. Campbell Morgan has been telling his congregation a little of his own history. He was for two years as a student a backslider though he had been early converted to God. His history resembles that of Spurgeon, who also was converted as a child, became skeptical and gloomy with doubt in his days of study, took to schoolteaching, and came into the function of preaching without passing first through a theological college, and then burst into fame on the population of London. Campbell Morgan preaches to a crowd every Sunday. He did not have the task, however, of gathering the throng, but found most of it awaiting him, because several popular preachers in succession have kept Tolington Park Church always full of hearers and worshipers. Thus he had only to enter on a splendid heritage. He became extra famous because he caught the fancy of Mr. Moody, just as Dr. Berry fascinated Henry Ward Beecher. And now the successor of Moody at Northfield is to be Campbell Morgan. This distinguished preacher belongs to the peculiar school known as the "Keswick" section of present-day theologians. He is one with F. B. Meyer, Fuller Gooch, and Murray of South Africa. These men are Adventists in their eschatology, and give great prominence to the Coming of Christ. They are intensely evangelical and are also somewhat narrow. Their popularity is great within certain spheres, but they do not possess national fame and influence, like Dr. Parker or the late C. H. Spurgeon. It is to be regretted more than any words of mine can express that such men, full of the finest spiritual feeling, should seem utterly incapable of appreciating the genuine apostolic plea and position. They never have a word to say against sectism. They oppose unsectarian Christians. And therefore they fail to lead the people aright, notwithstanding their power and the great degree of popularity which they command. Mr. Campbell is a charming man; but he is not likely to initiate any real return to the true and original faith and practice. He will do a great work and a noble one; but his ideal is not the highest, and he will leave the confusion of Christendom untouched. These men still leave the faithful and intelligent Disciples of Christ a glorious and essential mission to carry out, and to that splendid and honorable mission we must all be faithful unto death, even though the man for whose help we yearn hold aloof, and prefer to keep to the lines where the medley still is sustained of devoutness of spirit and Babylonianism of method. The effort to sanctify the Great Apostasy is well-meant, but it will pitiably fail.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

43 Park Road, South Tottenham, London, Dec. 20, 1900.

From Hillsburg to Halifax.

The End of the Journey.

My last letter left me in the Land of Evangeline, in Nova Scotia. Since then I have spent two months most pleasantly in the beautiful Province of Prince Edward Island, familiarly called by most Canadians "The Island," because it is much the greatest of all their island possessions, and a province of the Dominion in itself. It is fitly called the "Gem of the Gulf," for there is no more lovely spot to be found in North America. All Americans who visit it are delighted with its scenery, and the unbounded hospitality of its people. It is growing rapidly in favor with Americans as a summer resort.

The Island's greatest length is nearly 150 miles, and its general breadth nearly 30. Its climate is much milder than that of the adjacent provinces and fogs seldom occur. Wheat, barley, oats, peas, beans, potatoes, turnips, apples and other crops are most successfully grown. Nearly every foot of the soil is capable of cultivation, and farming is done carefully and systematically all over the Island. In its population of 110,000 less pauperism is found than among the same number of people in any other part of the continent. Owing to their first-class school system the per cent. of illiteracy is small.

Presbyterianism, Methodism, Baptistism and Roman Catholicism are the prevailing religions on the Island. The Disciples of Christ are fairly well represented, but as yet do not possess the strength of any of these. Here, as in other parts of the Dominion, our progress has been slow. We have had to fight for every inch of ground we have gained. But substantial progress is being made, so that we may hope for fine results in the near future. We now have a membership of about 1,000, with nine organizations, eleven houses of worship, and about six regular preachers. Many of our ablest preachers have, at various times, visited the Island and done most excellent service. Tired preachers go from their work in different parts of the States, spend the summer, or a part of it, preaching in that delightfully cool climate, and return to their people rested and invigorated. For tired, nervous people I do not think any better place can be found on the continent, during the summer season, than Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

At last Halifax has been reached and entered, and I do not know that I feel any the worse for the few hours there spent. As all know, Halifax is the capital of Nova Scotia. It has a population of about 40,000. From its long association with the army and navy of the mother country it is the most thoroughly British city on the continent. The evening we were there its streets were full of soldiers from the garrison and the war vessels resting at anchor in its commodious harbor, acknowledged to be the finest harbor in the world.

Halifax is a strongly fortified city, its chief defense being the Citadel, elevated 256 feet above the level of the sea. Its fortifications are second only to those of Quebec. During the Revolutionary War Halifax was the chief seaport town where British loyalists either volunteered to go, or where they were sent when they became troublesome to those who were fighting the British for their freedom. In this way the name Halifax had attached to it a bad odor in the minds of Americans. Hence its use in polite swearing in American society.

Halifax is the only finished city we met with in all our travels. It has made little or no progress in any direction for many years and is not likely to for many years to come. The people are so well satisfied with themselves and their present attainments that they are willing to jog along as they have been doing for the last fifty years.

On the evening of Nov. 14 we passed out of the city of Halifax into the steamer "Halifax," then lying at the wharf, on her trip from Prince Edward Island to Boston, and thus ended our long, but, in many respects, most pleasant tour in the Queen's country. During the voyage of 36 hours our vessel was tossed in such a manner as to give us a taste of real ocean life.

We remained in Boston and vicinity a little over two weeks. During this time we climbed to the top of Bunker Hill monument, saw many of the historical places in Boston, went out to Cambridge, saw Harvard University, the old oak where Washington took charge of the American armies, saw Longfellow's and Lowell's residences where they lived and wrote, and their last resting places in Mount Auburn cemetery. Two days were spent in old Springfield. There we had the pleasure of visiting the United States Armory, where thousands of men are at work making guns for the use of Uncle Sam's soldiers. On December 4, just seven months after our departure, we reached our home in Chicago in safety, to find all the loved ones well, and in the midst of a successful revival in our home church. H. J. Angelic Ministrations.

By C. H. Wetherbe.

The accounts which the Holy Shriptures give us of the ministrations of the angels of God are full of intense interest to a student of the ways of God to men.

While these accounts are rather fragmentary, yet they disclose enough to afford much thought to a reflective mind. I have recently read with absorbed attention Daniel's account of the visit to him of the angel Gabriel at the time of his impassioned pleading with God in behalf of the desolated Israelites. Daniel states that while he was praying, "the man Gabriel," whom he had seen in a former vision, touched him. This visit seems to have been unexpected by Daniel. Gabriel told him the purpose of his mission to him in these words: "O Daniel, I am now come forth to make thee skillful of understanding." There is much significance in this brief message. It is suggestive of more than is seen in the bare message. Daniel had already shown that he was a man who was very skillful in understanding. God had enabled him to exhibit an amount of wisdom which far exceeded anything that the wisest men of the kingdom possessed. He had interpreted dreams for the king which no other man was able to interpret, and yet he was in need of more wisdom; he was still a learner; it was now time for him to be further instructed, and he was quite willing to receive instruction. Another feature of Gabriel's ministration was his relating to Daniel something of the occasion of his visit. He said: "At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment went forth, and I am come to tell thee, for thou art greatly beloved; therefore consider the matter and understand the vision." It is evident that there was a conference in heaven in regard to Daniel, his work and his needs. Just when Daniel began his prayer and supplication God commanded his archangel Gabriel to fly down to his servant and give him skill in understanding certain important matters. It would seem that heaven cannot be very far from earth, for Gabriel started for Daniel at the beginning of his prayer, and arrived at his side in the midst of Daniel's praying. Two things, in particular, Daniel must have appreciated. One was the proffer of instruction by one so competent as Gabriel, and the other was the assurance that he was "greatly beloved."

That was a wonderful day in young Daniel's life. The impressions which he then received kept fresh through all of the coming years. It is probable that we, too, are often the subjects of angelic ministrations.

The Old Preacher.

By Elmer T. Davis.

The old preacher was once a young man with all the possibilities for wealth and fame before him that other young men had, but he looked beyond earthly things that perish to heavenly things that never pass away. He could have been a good lawyer, teacher or physician, but he chose to expound the laws of God rather than the laws of man; to teach the wisdom of God rather than human wisdom; to heal the soul that shall live after the sun ceases to shine rather than the body that in a few years will turn to dust.

He has learned many things by experience that you and I will never know until we sit at the feet of the same Great Teacher. He is not complaining of the hardships he has met, but with knowledge and faith in God gained in the battle of life he doesn't like to be standing idle when the Father calls him home. He has sacrificed so much to win souls, their value has grown with every year's work; do you wonder he refuses to leave the vineyard now?

After seeing a few hundred Disciples with no creed but Christ, no object but to enthrone him in the hearts of the world, grow into a million in less than three-fourths of a century, is it strange he still wants to be a worker with God?

The old lawyer, merchant, physician or general is valued for the experience he has gained, why not the old preacher? He knows how to organize new congregations, how to take care of old ones, how to bind together broken ones.

What a blessing is the old preacher at the marriage feast; he knows life's joys as well as its sorrows. Then when your mother died how you wanted the old preacher to come; how warm his hand grasp, how strong his faith, how bright his hope. He remembered when his mother died and he knew how your heart ached, and yet how God's grace sustains. Then when that little life that came into your home like angel from heaven was called back to the loving Father's arms, when it seemed like a part of your own life had gone, when you prayed for strength and grace to wait for the tearless land and wondered how so much could be given, how dear the words of the old preacher, what sunshine he brought. He had watched his little flowers fade, he had looked into the little white casket in his own home; he, too, had treasures laid up in heaven; no one ever talked of heaven like that old preacher. No one can talk of the home and friends over there like him whose home has been broken here and whose friends are over there. When I am called to leave all that is earthly to receive all that is heavenly I want the old preacher there, and when I cross that threshold I know he will greet me there. Let us thank God for the old preacher. May the rays of life's setting sun glitter upon his sickle as he gathers the golden grain. May his shouts of eternal triumph and victory come from the harvest field surrounded by his freshly gathered sheaves. May he be allowed to receive his crown, face Zionward sword in hand with all his armor on. But what shall we do with the old preacher? Retire him? Not as long as there is need of hope, faith, counsel and courage. But let us love him, employ him, PAY him and help him.

Three Desirable Things.

In planning for the March Offering for Foreign Missions there are three things that should be steadfastly kept in view.

1. The leaders should seek to get a larger proportion of the members of the church to give. Enlist every member if possible. A personal canvass will bear good fruit. One man not accustomed to give, in answer to a personal appeal, gave more than the whole church gave the year before.

2. There should be an effort to get more churches to give. Last year the contributing churches numbered 3,067. That is less than half the number. There is no church that cannot give something. A church may be small or poor or without a house of worship, but it will become stronger by making an offering. It should be borne in mind that a church is not impoverished by what it gives nor enriched by what it withholds. There is that scattereth and yet increaseth, and there is that withholdeth more than is meet and it tendeth to poverty.

3. Larger offerings should be secured from those who do give. The gifts of the churches that gave last year averaged $20.50. This is a gain of 40 per cent. over the average offerings four or five years ago. The growth is very encouraging, but it is still true that we are not giving as we are able to give. The country was never before so rich and prosperous. Money was never so abundant. There are few Christians and few churches that could not easily double their contributions. We should give until we feel our giving. We should give that which costs us something.

The March offering is one of the supreme events of the year. A church should go about taking it as it goes about building a house of worship or paying off an old debt. It should lay plans for it as a general does for a battle. Failure here means disaster. The work of the year depends upon this offering. In some churches no plans are formed and no announcements are made. The minister in charge on the day for the offering states that any who wish to give can do so. No emphasis is laid upon it. No enthusiasm is manifested. As a rule the amount received is a pittance. In other churches the matter is overlooked entirely. In the best churches the offering is well advertised in advance, and the offerings are worthy of the great cause of world-wide missions.

Current Literature.

If one wishes to see a curiosity in literature and to make a psychological study of the effect on the human mind and conscience of a certain theory, he can hardly do better than to read The Negro A Beast, By Charles Carroll,(American Book and Bible House, St. Louis,) by one who admits himself to be "the Reasoner of the Age, the Revelator of the Century!" The theory of the author in short is that the negro is a beast without a human soul or spirit, and of course "without God and without hope in the world." Not only so, but all the colored races are also beasts and not to be classed with the human race. Of course, Mr. Carroll attempts to find his authority in the Bible for his strange theory. He also quotes many of the leading scientists. The quotations from the scientists, however, are to prove something that nobody denies, the inferiority of the negro and the other colored races in their craniological and intellectual development. The Scriptures, of course, are interpreted to suit the theory, and the author denounces all as "atheists" who do not accept his absurd, not to say blasphemous, interpretation. For bold assumption, for the utter perversion of facts in the interest of a theory, for dogmatic conclusions, which in their consequences, if accepted, would strike down the hopes and aspirations of a large majority of the human race, stifle all our foreign missionary work and all our efforts to lift up the lower races, and for bitter race prejudice, which is at war with the whole spirit and teaching of the New Testament, we have seen nothing that equals this book, and we commend it to the oblivion which it merits. When one compares a negro like Booker T. Washington with the author of this volume, who boasts of his Caucasian blood, he sees a sufficient refutation of the theory advocated in the book in the vast superiority of the negro philanthropist and educator, in all that gives character and glory to manhood. But for the request of a reader who sends us the book for notice, and who seems disturbed by its reasoning, we should not have given it this space.

New books about China and the Chinese have been appearing frequently since the recent disorders in that land brought it into the focus of the world's thought, and it is not inappropriate that at the same time we should have a new consideration of the Chinese who dwell within our own national borders. Dr. Ira M. Condit in The Chinaman as We See Him, tells of Chinese society in this country, its virtues and vices, its prejudices, its religious worship and the efforts which have been made toward Christianizing and civilizing the Chinese in America. The author speaks from the experience of fifty years of work among them, and he knows both the light and the dark sides of the problem. He believes that there are great possibilities in Chinese character, and takes a position in regard to their immigration and the "cheap Chinese labor" question which would not be approved by most people on the Pacific Coast. The book is extensively illustrated from photographs. (Revell. $1.25.)

Readers who have been looking for a brief and vigorous exposition of the "old theology" as distinguished from the "new," one which is not too dull to read and intelligent enough to respect, will find it in Dr. Lofton's So, or The Gospel in a Monosyllable. The author makes John 3:16 the scriptural basis of his system of theology, and the entire book is an exposition of that verse. While professing Calvinism, he expresses a view of faith which is free from those criticisms to which the Calvinistic view is open and which freely recognizes the freedom of the human will. The provision of grace is universal, but its application is limited to those who voluntarily believe the gospel. Faith precedes repentance—and the author is a Baptist, too. He says: "We must believe the truth as in Jesus in order to conviction of sin, repentance toward God and trust in the Lord Jesus Christ for life and righteousness." If we are not mistaken, the author comes very near the truth in stating the relation of faith and repentance. Belief precedes repentance; trust is a process of development which accompanies and follows. Belief and trust together make up faith in the fullest sense. The author's "old theology" comes out more strongly in his treatment of the atonement where he lays an emphasis upon the efficacy of blood and vicarious suffering that marks him distinctly as not of the new school. Altogether it is a very strong and readable statement of the main points of Christian theology from the point of view of a moderate conservative. (Revell. $1.25.)

A new book by Newell Dwight Hillis is both a literary and a religious event, and his readers and admirers will find no reason for disappointment in his latest volume, The Influence of Christ in Modern Life. Dr. Hillis stands almost unique among contemporary religious writers as one whose thought and style alike are in the highest degree marked, but not in the slightest degree marred, by striking originality. A style so crisp and sparkling, so epigrammatic and trenchant, is a dangerous tool in the hand of any but a master. Or, to change the figure, it is a perilous path on a dizzy height where one false step means a plunge from the sunlit mount of vision into the deepest and most hopeless of all literary abysses—affectation and conceit of originality. But Dr. Hillis never makes the false step; the keen tool in his hand never slips. In tracing the influence of Christ in modern life, he shows how those ideas which have grown to be characteristic of our age in their emphasis, if not in their origin, agree with the teaching of the Master and point to him still as the wisest as well as the purest of those who have lived among men. The conceptions of the immanence of God and of evolution as God's way of working have helped this generation to a better understanding of God's thoughts for man and to a more fruitful and inspiring acceptance of the teaching of Christ. (The Macmillan Co. $1.50.)

An admirable story of old Albany in the years just preceding the Revolutionary War is The Black Gown, by Ruth Hall. It is at once a robust story of adventure, a charming romance and a praiseworthy study of the mixture of races—Dutch, English, French and Indian—in upper New York, and the interplay of racial prejudices in the social and political life of the time. For a lover to change ladies in the midst of a romance—no matter for how plausible a reason—is as risky as swapping horses in the middle of the stream. But Neal does it and the reader approves. Finding his beloved unworthy, after a period of suffering for the sorrowful fact of her unworthiness he ceases to love her, cheers up and loves a better. All of which goes to show that a hero, if skilfully handled, may be sentimentally satisfactory without being wholly an idiot. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50.)

Especially deserving of favorable mention at this time are three little books entitled, Concerning the Disciples, by B. B. Tyler, Sketches of our Pioneers, by F. D. Power, and Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples, by F. D. Power. They are the handbooks which will be used by the Bethany C. E. Reading Circle during the present quarter, during which the subject will be the position and work of the Disciples of Christ. The first volume contains a statement of the main facts in the history of the Disciples, but its arrangement, in the main, is topical and it includes chapters on the principal doctrines held generally by the Disciples. It is rather a defense than a history. The second is a series of biographical sketches of the leaders of the movement, and it furnishes probably the most vivid and readable account of the origin and development of the Disciples of Christ from Thomas Campbell to Isaac Errett. The third is what one might call a simple and elementary book of theology. It is reasonably systematic in its method, but to call it a treatise on Systematic Theology would be giving a too austere characterization to a pleasing and readable little volume. (J. Z. Tyler, 798 Republic St., Cleveland. Three for $1.)

Many are the schemes invented to enable literary workers and others to preserve clippings and notes in systematic arrangement. The trouble with all such schemes is that they do not work themselves and the man who has that type of mind which will diligently work such schemes, generally invents a scheme of his own. The Clipping File is a topical arrangement, not overly complicated and adaptable to use in all sorts of special departments. Each volume consists of a case containing ten filing envelopes, together with an index card. The scheme of arrangement is printed on the backs of the envelopes. Nearly all the large libraries have abandoned the illogical alphabetical arrangement in cataloging books and have adopted a topical arrangement similar to that here applied to clippings. (The Clipping File Co., Cleveland, O. $1 per vol.)

The D. L. Moody Year Book is a little volume which will be appreciated by admirers of Mr. Moody's writings. A selection about half a page in length with an appropriate verse of Scripture is arranged for each day in the year. (Revell. $1.)

Dropped It.

Quit Coffee and Got Well.

"My breakfast never seemed complete without coffee, but the stomach became gradually weakened, although I had no idea of the cause. An hour or so after eating, a dull aching pain would come in my stomach and sick headache set up. This misery would continue two or three hours, increasing to an intense burning pain, until relieved by vomiting, then I would quickly recover.

"These attacks grew more frequent, and the pain more intense, until it began to affect my general health. I tried many remedies for strengthening my stomach, until finally I noticed that the much-loved coffee appeared to have a wooden taste, and I concluded to see what effect leaving it off would have.

"In a short time, the sick, aching attacks ceased entirely, gradually my stomach regained its vigor. I began drinking Postum Food Coffee and I discovered by experiment that it has a delicious crisp coffee taste and yet I could drink all I wanted of it, without any oppression; on the contrary, it gave me a well-fed, nourished and lightened feeling, instead of the old oppression.

"My general health has been greatly improved and I am able to eat, without fear, many things I dared not attempt before. I am grateful that someone has found so satisfactory a beverage. It is already a boon to thousands who have been troubled with coffee drinking, and there are yet thousands who, if they knew the cause of their trouble, would get well by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. Please omit name." Name and address furnished by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Our Budget.

—We trust that January was remembered by the churches as State Mission month.

—One duty faithfully discharged always prepares us better for doing the next. It is in doing the present duty that we get strength for the duties that lie ahead.

—We must again express thanks for the many words of appreciation of the improvements we have made in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. We are simply trying to do our duty to the brotherhood in furnishing them a high-class religious journal, and we are relying on the brotherhood to do their duty in sustaining us in these efforts.

—All our hearts go out in tenderest sympathy to the English people in the loss of their gracious Queen who at this writing is on the verge of that shadowy vale which men call death. The whole world loves Queen Victoria and will mingle its tears with those of her subjects in every land.

—It is a great thing to so live and so discharge the private and public duties of life that our departure causes universal sorrow and that our memory will remain an inspiration to noble efforts on the part of those who come after us. Such has been the good fortune of Britain's loved and honored Queen.

—One by one our own great leaders are passing from the stage of human action where they have wrought for the good of mankind in the interest of religious reform into that spiritual world of whose joys, fellowships and activities we know so little. Our cause, however, will ever remain the richer for the lives of these godly men which have been consecrated to it.

—Robert Graham has gone from us, but his influence will abide with us and with the cause he loved while time lasts. There will never cease to be a succession of men whose lives he has influenced for good, directly and indirectly, while the world stands. His thoughts, his principles, his character, his unselfish life—these are not dead; they belong to the unperishable wealth of the world.

—But the lesson which these frequent departures of our fellow-laborers impress upon us is plain enough. The time is short. What we do must be done quickly. The night cometh when no man can work. The evening shadows will come all too soon for our unfinished tasks. While there is yet health and vigor, or while the brain is yet able to think and the heart to feel, let us be about our Father's business.

—The School of Pastoral Helpers, located at Cincinnati, has just issued its announcement for 1901. The second term opened Jan. 15, and will close May 14. The work of the school is of a much more substantial and practical sort than many of our readers appreciate. The announcement shows a faculty of five members and five special lecturers and the city of Cincinnati furnishes ample material for the study of life in the concrete.

—A subscriber in our national capital, having by some mischance failed to receive a certain issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, writes a letter begging us to send it at once, saying, "everyone in the house is crazy to know how Pete gets on. There are a number of prophecies regarding the outcome from the household and the neighbors." If you are not reading Pete you'd better begin.

—S. D. Dutcher has resigned the work at Mexico to accepts a call from the church at Oklahoma City. Much as we regret to see Bro. Dutcher leave Missouri and the church at Mexico, where he has done such good work, we are glad to know that our ministerial ranks in Oklohoma are to be re-enforced by one of our most successful pastors and preachers. The change goes into effect, we understand, sometime in February.

—C. C. Waite, of Sharon, Pa., writes that Herbert Yeuell delivered an illustrated lecture at that place which was highly appreciated.

—The Endeavor Society of the First Church in Colorado Springs, F. N. Calvin, pastor, is raising $60 this year for Foreign Missions.

—The congregation in Hickory Point, Mo., would be grateful if any congregation having old song books will donate a few dozen to them. Address Absalom, Bear, Iberia, Mo.

—The address of Mrs. Givens, to which B. B. Tyler referred a few weeks ago in speaking of Professor Bruner's book on Evolution, is 1249 Columbine Street, Denver.

—The address of E. N. Newman, as secretary of the Virginia Christian Missionary Society, will hereafter be Box 161, Richmond, Va.

—The Widows' and Orphans' Home at Louisville, Ky., has recently received $650 from its Executive Board and property worth $1,500 towards its endowment.

—L. L. Carpenter, of Wabash, Ind., dedicated a new and tasteful house of worship at Ridge Farm, Ill., on Jan. 13. He reports that the dedication was a successful one.

—J. S. Bledsoe, of Stanford, Ky., died on Dec. 18, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. He was a reader of this paper for many years and a Christian gentleman of sterling virtues.

—Thomas B. Howe, who went recently to Owingsville, Ky., reports that after being there three weeks he is delighted with the situation and expects to do a good work.

—J. W. Lowber, of Austin, Tex., is delivering a series of chapel addresses in the auditorium of the University of Texas on "The Book of Genesis and Modern Culture."

—Hugh McLellan has resigned the work in Shelbyville, Ky., to take charge of the church in Richmond, Ky., which William Ross Lloyd is leaving. Bro. McLellan has been with the church at Shelbyville six years.

E. J. Willis has, after a three years' pastorate, declined to continue with the church at Henderson, Ky. He will either go to Clarksville, Tenn., or become general evangelist for south Kentucky.

—The Foreign Society received a gift of $626.50 on the Annuity Plan the 17th of January. The whole amount now in this fund is $110,623.50. Of this amount, one brother gave $17,200 and another brother, $15,000.

—C. C. Redgrave, of Maroa, Ill., gave his lecture "In the Footprints of the Pioneers" to a large audience at Jacksonville, Ill., on Jan. 13. Geo. L. Snively, the pastor at that place, speaks of the lecture in terms of the highest praise.

—Our preachers in Denver meet every Monday at 2 P. M., in Room 5 of the Toltec Building, corner of 17th and Stout streets. They will be pleased to have brethren from out of town and strangers in Denver meet with them.

—James McAllister, who was called to occupy the pulpit in the Central Christian Church for three months, beginning last October, has been unanimously requested by the official board to continue his pastorate until October 1, next. He is doing a good work and by his single-hearted devotion to the cause he is winning many warm friends.

Rheumatism

What is the use of telling the rheumatic that he feels as if his joints were being dislocated?

He knows that his sufferings are very much like the tortures of the rack.

What he wants to know is what will permanently cure his disease.

That, according to thousands of grateful testimonials, is

Hood's Sarsaparilla

It corrects the acidity of the blood on which the disease depends, strengthens the stomach, liver and kidneys, and builds up the whole system. Try Hood's.

—A. C. Eaton, evangelist, can be engaged for a few meetings during the winter and spring at reasonable rates. His address is Buffalo, Ill.

—The Irvington (Ind.) Athenæum in connection with Butler College has a list of distinguished speakers for its monthly meetings during the winter and spring. On Jan. 14, Thomas Wentworth Higginson gave the address on American Orators and Oratory.

—The little congregation of Disciples at Durand, Mich., was organized two years ago by S. S. Jones, and has never had a pastor. In spite of its own debt, which is a heavy one for so weak a church, it has contributed to all the missions. They would be glad to have help with their debt, and they deserve it.

—Mrs. T. J. Clark, of Bloomington, Ind., writes in commendatory terms of the entertainment called "Tom Thumb's Wedding," prepared and conducted by Miss Electa Chase, of Wabash, Ind. It is spoken of as a good money-raiser and a pleasing performance.

—Miss Addie Beard, an accomplished and thoroughly consecrated young lady, blind from her birth, a devoted member of the Christian Church, with a sweet and cultivated voice, would like a position as soloist in some church. Address her in care of Miss Mattie Williamson, Matron Christian Orphans' Home, 915 Aubert Avenue, St. Louis, Mo.

—The Ladies' Aid Society of the First Christian Church of Lincoln, Neb., on Jan. 1, deposited $100 in the bank as the beginning of a church building fund. A member writes: "It was made through the industry and self-sacrifice of consecrated women. It may be that some good man or woman may, like our dear Bro. Atkinson, 'be thankful that he is considered worthy to help.' We are worthy of such help and it will be most gratefully received."

—S. R. Maxwell has submitted his resignation as pastor of the Third Christian Church at Richmond, Va., to take effect Feb. 15. He will succeed A. B. Moore at Macon, Ga. During Bro. Maxwell's pastorate of two years at Richmond the congregation has grown from 460 to 670 members and a church seating 800 has been built. $15,000 has been raised for all purposes in that time. A committee of ten has been selected to secure a successor and communications can be addressed to Rev. Henry Stuart, 710 E. Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

—Our readers will be grieved, and many of them surprised, to learn of the death of Bro. Robert Graham, after a severe illness, at the home of his niece, Mrs. H. A. Spangler, in Pittsburg. For many years he was president of Kentucky University and also of the College of the Bible at Lexington and Hocker Female College. In 1898 he retired from the Chair of Philosophy which he had held in Kentucky University. He was 79 years of age at the time of his death. Robert Graham was born in Liverpool, England, on the 14th of August, 1822, and was brought up in the communion of the Established Church. On coming to Allegheny, Pa., in his boyhood he became a member of the Methodist Protestant Church. Later he made the acquaintance of the congregation of the Disciples of Christ in Allegheny and united with it. At that time he was serving as an apprentice "in the art and mystery of house-carpentry" in the city of ittsburg. He entered Bethany College in 1843 and began his ministry the following year. He graduated at Bethany in 1847, dividing the first honors of his class with A. R. Benton and delivering the Latin salutatory. He removed to Fayetteville, Ark., in 1849, establishing Arkansas College and the Christian College at that place. The remainder of his life was spent as stated above. He was a graceful speaker and writer, a man of profound piety and of wide learning. There are many to-day in the ranks of our ministry who would gladly acknowledge the influence of his life and teaching on their character. We tender our sympathy to the surviving members of his family and to the whole brotherhood which he has served so long and so efficiently. We present a picture of him on our first page.

—We learn through the Globe-Democrat that our venerable brother John G. Fee, of Berea, Ky., has passed away, though no particulars are given and no date. Bro. Fee was born in Bracken County, Ky., Sept. 9, 1816. He was in his eighty-fifth year, therefore, at the time of his death. Though his father was a slave-holder, he himself soon formed very deep convictions against the institution of slavery and devoted his life largely to the cause of anti-slavery agitation before the war and to negro education since the war. He was a man of benevolent impulses, broad views, profound piety and undaunted courage. Some of the events recorded in his autobiography (published by the National Christian Association, Chicago, 1891) remind one of the spirit of martrydom manifested by the early Christians in the times of persecution. More than once has he had a rope about his neck, and he was often the victim of threats, persecution and abuse. But none of these things moved him. For a good while he was associated religiously with an independent church, pleading for Christian union and receiving persons into its fellowship without regard to the ordinance of baptism. He was afterwards convinced of the inutility of such an effort and brought the congregation into line with the churches of this reformation on that and other points. Of late years he was much concerned with the subject of the Holy Spirit, believing that there was not sufficient emphasis given to the New Testament teaching on this subject. We have published some articles from him treating this question. He has shown himself a true hero of the cross. He has fought a good fight; he has finished his course; he has kept the faith and, we doubt not, has entered into that rich reward awaiting those who count not their lives precious if only they may advance the cause of truth and righteousness in the world.

—T. M. Patterson, the most liberal donor to the building fund of the Central Christian Church, Denver, Col., has been chosen United States Senator, says Bruce Brown. He has been for many years one of the Central's best friends and his wife and daughter are devoted members. Mr. Patterson began life as a poor apprentice and he is now the most successful lawyer and editor in the state and one of its wealthiest and most honored citizens. Mrs. Patterson is a grand-niece of Alexander Campbell, and while she is called to lead in every great society event she is never too busy to perform any service in behalf of the church. She is one of the most active members of our building committee and opened her palatial home every week for three months for its meetings.

Lectures on Revelation.

It has been the pleasure of the good people of Des Moines to hear Bro. J. S. Hughes, of Chicago, through a course of lectures on the book of Revelation. It is well known that this man has devoted many years to a diligent study of this book; and this justly entitles him to a candid hearing. The acknowledged difficulties in the way of interpreting such a work discourage most people from undertaking it, and cause many more to distrust any effort to unravel its mysteries. He seems to be well aware of this public distrust, and tells it as a joke that he sometimes observes men scrutinizing him to see whether they can discover any traces of derangement!

It may be interesting to note some of his thoughts. He holds that the Roman Catholic Church for ages idolized the Apostle Peter, that next the Protestants exalted Paul, and that henceforth the church will recognize in John the greatest teacher of all. These three great apostles will thus be leaders of three great epochs of the church's advancement.

He holds that the seven churches of Asia stand for the totality of churches and that their messages are as much for other churches in like conditions as for those named in the letters. The angels of the seven churches are the twelve apostles, seven again representing totality.

He teaches that the opening of the seven great seals, the sounding of the seven trumpets, the voices of seven evangels, and the pouring out of seven bowls of wrath, with the events that accompany each, all represent the same series of fates and fortunes of men. Each seven covers the whole view of time which is intended to be treated in this part of the book.

He notices that four seals describe the progress of evil, while the remaining three relate the triumphs of right. He interprets the four beasts, the four angels standing on the four corners of the earth holding the four winds, the same as the four parts of Nebuchadnezzar's image and the four beasts of Daniel, to mean the nations of the earth as a totality.

The number three is used for the church or the cause of truth. The victory of the three over the four gives seven, the symbol of the final triumph of right, the sabbatic peace and glory. All sevens are based on the seven days of creation. All numbers in Revelation are symbolic. Six is diabolical; and the number 666 is supremely devilish and does not stand for any particular man. The book does not intend to mark any dates, nor to make any definite or personal predictions concerning the enemies of the church. The enemies are set forth by character, and any in any age who fill the measure are meant. These characters, however, are so plain that we may recognize many of them and point to examples of them.

All wars mentioned in the book are conflicts between the good and the bad. The battle of Armageddon is not to be located at any particular time or place. It is a tremendous struggle, perhaps now going on, against the powers of evil in the world. Likewise the closing description of the new Jerusalem refers to the triumphs of the saints on earth and their sabbatic peace after victory.

BABY LAUGH

It belongs to health, for a baby, to eat and sleep, to laugh and grow fat.

But fat comes first; don't ask a scrawny baby to laugh; why, even his smile is pitiful! Fat comes first.

The way to be fat is the way to be healthy. Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil is the proper food, if he needs it; but only a little at first.

We'll send you a little to try if you like.

Texas Letter.

The new century found this vigorous new country of ours with 195,155 miles of railroad, which, all things considered, is not a bad showing. But it is only a beginning. In a country as large as ours, and peopled by a constituency which likes to be on the move, and to move in a hurry, there must be more and better railroads. This is especially true in Texas, a vast empire about 800 miles square. The south and southwest lead in railroad construction at this time. During last year the fifteen southern states built 1,716 miles of new road, and Texas leads with 318 miles. She not only leads in the south, but she leads the whole procession, with Pennsylvania a good second with 277 miles, Iowa with 267, Minnesota with 251, and West Virginia with 225.

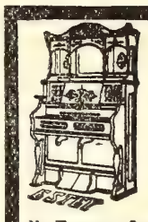
The oil interests of our state are being rapidly increased. Corsicana, fifty miles south of Dallas, is the center of this interest, and as a result is a splendid young city. But within the last few days Beaumont, two hundred and fifty miles further south, and near the seaboard, is threatening to claim that honor. The papers say that a well has been bored there, which excels anything in the state, and that it sends a column of oil one hundred feet high. The moral of all this is that you good people "up north" should come down into the "Sunny South."

C. M. Schoonover, of Windsor, Mo., has accepted a call to Greenville, Texas, and will begin work soon. He is a graduate of Kentucky University, and comes to us with high commendations. Greenville is a fine field, and we cordially welcome Bro. Schoonover to Texas.

Huntsville, one of the most important points in the state, led by E. C. Boynton, has hopes of a new house soon. They do not ask me to say it, but it is none the less true that our people there are few and poor in this world's goods, and some of the rich would make no mistake by helping them a little in this hour of need.

Corsicana, our coming oil city already spoken of, is pastorless. Philip F. King has resigned, and it is feared that he will leave the state. We regret this, for he is a young man of much promise.

Wichita Falls, another good town, the metropolis of the Panhandle wheat fields, has no pastor. C. L. Clinkenbeard has left them for the work at Melissa. Both of these places should have strong men.



The Texas legislature prefers to pay for their prayers, and in this they are unlike some other people I have met, who will accept both preaching and prayers free. When that body met a few days since they found a proposition from the preachers of Austin to furnish them chaplain service free, these brethren thinking it unbecoming the dignity of the "cloth" to be striving for the position like ordinary politicians. But our solons did not appreciate this tender of service, and chaplains were elected as usual.

Dallas and Ft. Worth are to be united by an electric railway. They are only thirty-two miles apart, and this may be the beginning which will end in the consolidation of the two cities.

J. B. Boen, one of our best-known evangelists, is a fine business man, and he is now located as a banker at Seymour. But he will preach in the regions near by as opportunity offers.

Galveston Letter.

A Letter of Thanks.

To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ. Grace to you and peace from God our Father.

We give thanks to God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you, having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have toward all the saints, because of the hope which is laid up for you in the heavens, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel which is come unto you; even as it is also in all the world bearing fruit and increasing, as it doth in you also, since the day ye heard and knew the grace of God in truth.

No words, save such as these of the great Apostle-saint, will express to you, beloved brethren and sisters everywhere, the thanks of the Galveston church for your contributions to our people since the great storm. You have cared for us and the Lord's cause in this city as the people of no other religious body have done for their own. This has been largely due to the solicitude and care for her own child of our beloved American Christian Missionary Society.

I recount what has been done with the money and supplies sent us:

Firstly, we have repaired the church building, and have also paid the mortgage debt upon the property. If this could not have been done now, with our depleted membership the prospects for getting out of debt would have been meager indeed.

Secondly, we have warmed and fed our own members who were in want, besides many others.

Again, we have paid cash eleven hundred dollars for a parsonage. This fortunate move also will help the church to become self-supporting much sooner than otherwise. This property was secured by a "snap" bargain; it rents readily for twenty dollars; it will sell for fifteen hundred.

Organs have been donated by B. F. Cook, Seguin, Texas, and by Mrs. G. A. Willett with the church at Ionia, Michigan. Filmore brothers made us a gift of seventy-five Praise Hymnals.

Other gifts have been numerous, and are no less worthy. I have not space to give a list. God knows. We have expended quite a good deal in caring for the destitute. Many boxes of supplies have come to us well filled, and have been put to good use indeed. Our people are comfortable again for the present.

All contributions sent to Galveston direct have been acknowledged by myself. On behalf of these dear people I thank you in the Lord.

A Wholesome Tonic

Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. S. L. Williams, Clarence, Iowa, says: "I have used it to grand effect in cases where a general tonic was needed. For a nerve tonic I think it the best I have ever used."

A Gifted Convert.

Last Sunday there preached for us at the Richmond Ave. Church of Christ, in Buffalo, Bro. Frank Hyatt Smith, of Williamsville, N. Y. He has recently come into our church from the Congregationalists, under the influence of Bro. Irwin, of Williamsville. Bro. Smith was pastor of the North Avenue Congregational Church in Cambridge, Mass., at the time that I was a student in Harvard University. I heard him preach while there and know of the character of his work. His health failed, and he came west to the neighborhood of Buffalo, his wife's home, where he has been recuperating for the past year. This seems to have been a providential occurrence, for he came under the influence of our people in the old mother church of Western New York, and has found among us the kind of religious views that he has long held.

Bro. Smith is a graduate, with honors, of Princeton University, having taken the prize in oratory; and is also a master of arts of the university. He was given a fellowship in English Literature in Columbia University, of New York, where he studied for some time, finally entering Union Theological Seminary. If I am not mistaken, he was for a time an instructor in Princeton College in history or English. Bro. Smith is a graceful and fluent speaker, a wide reader with a ready memory, and a man of cordial and kindly bearing. We have formed a class of about twenty-five at the Richmond Avenue church to whom he will lecture weekly on the history of English Literature from now until spring.

Bro. Smith is capable of filling acceptably any pulpit in the brotherhood; but he does not desire a pastorate, as he has accepted charge of our Williamsville church during the time that Bro. Irwin shall serve our State Board as evangelist. I hope to accompany Bro. Smith to Lexington to our congress in March where he can meet some of our brethren, and learn something of the great power of our people at the west. As he sees us here, we are but an obscure people compared with our western influence.

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

Maryland, Delaware and D. C.

We recently had Bro. C. C. Redgrave, of Maroa, Ill., to give his lecture in our church at Rockville. He has fine views, his address is interesting, given in well-chosen language, and in an attractive manner.

It is hoped to open our new summer encampment, Bethany Beach, on the Atlantic Ocean, in Delaware, on July 4, 1901, with appropriate ceremonies. A good many lots have been sold already, and we hope to make it an ideal resort for Disciples. Write to R. R. Bulgin, Millville, Del.

Preachers' meeting was held in Washington, Monday, Jan. 14. Our preachers are busy. Bro. Power is off this week to lecture at Bellaire, Ohio, and at Bethany College. Bro. Bagby is with P. A. Cave in a meeting at Hagerstown. W. J. Wright has W. H. Book in a meeting in Southwest Washington. W. S. Hoye has been holding a meeting at Downsville. The writer helped him two evenings. B. A. Abbott is preparing for a meeting in Baltimore.

To the churches in our district who have not paid on their apportionment let me say we need money very much, and hope they will remit at once, so they will be free to work in February to bring up the March collection for Foreign Missions.

The first Lord's day in January our congregation at Rockville had reports from the different departments of work. The obligations were all paid up to Jan. 1 lacking a few dollars. The C. E. reported that in the ten years of its existence it has failed to meet three times, on the occasion of a storm, a flood, and an alarm of fire. They take turns with other Young People's Societies in holding services at the county jail on Sunday afternoons.

Four churches here have held interesting union services during the Week of Prayer: Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist and Christian. Each preacher preached one evening. The other evenings we had talks by members of the various churches. One good Methodist brother said he thought the devil divided us, and took rather advanced ground in his talk. The writer preached the missionary sermon.

Minnesota Letter.

The Minnesota Messenger is a quarterly sheet, printed on the mimeograph and mailed to the Minnesota churches free of charge by our State Secretary, J. K. Shellenberger, of Madelia. From it I glean many of the following items.

Leslie Wolf, the young pastor at Amboy and Lewisville, is doing a very acceptable work in his field.

C. J. Tanner, the Minneapolis pastor, recently held a four weeks' meeting in his own church with 34 additions.

John Treloar is making a most excellent impression on the people of Austin where he is now pastor.

H. T. Sutton, of Redwood Falls, is moving his church on to better things. They expect to begin a meeting soon.

M. B. Ainsworth is making a heroic struggle to overcome great disadvantages and achieve success for the church in Duluth.

Eden Valley and Maine Prairie churches are rejoicing in the possession of a new pastor in the person of W. W. Divine, formerly of Luther, Mich. Bro. Divine is at present in the midst of a very successful meeting at Maine Prairie with a goodly number of additions.

Our church at Plainview will join with the Methodists and Congregationalists in a union revival to be conducted by Shawham, of Kansas City.

W. S. Lemmon's meeting at Dassell added 40 to the church. Bro. Lemmon has become State Evangelist of South Dakota. We are sorry to lose him from this state, and at the same time wish him great success across the line.

John R. Golden, of Illinois, has just settled as pastor of the church at Ronneby.

C. A. Buridge has closed his work at Rochester and expects to locate elsewhere soon.

The Minnesota Christian Ministerial Association will hold its next meeting with the St. Paul church, April 3rd and 4th. The program is about completed, and it will be one of great helpfulness to our ministry. It will soon appear in these columns.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

In Home Department work, the school at Monroe City stands at the head of the class in Missouri. In her last quarterly report, Mrs. Cora Umstattd, the efficient superintendent of that department, says: "In fourteen visits I received fourteen reports and fourteen offerings, while five have joined the main school."

M. H. Wood did good service at Naylor with good results, and the friends send many thanks to the brotherhood for his generous assistance. His headquarters are now at Doniphan, where the brethren of the southeast may address him if in need of his help, as many are.

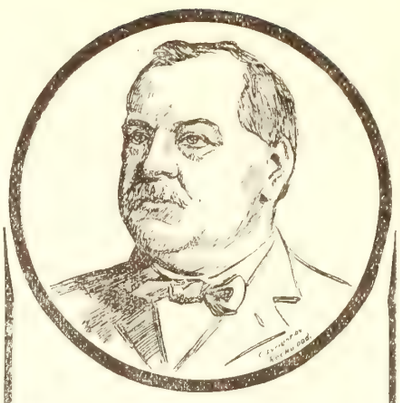
Of the $6,000 raised and expended by the Central, St. Louis, during 1900, $3,900 of the amount, or nearly two-thirds, was spent on missions, and of the entire amount the Bible-school and Endeavor contributed a large part.

The work inaugurated at Alton, county seat of Oregon, will result in a new house, but not so soon as in other parts of the state, for where the membership is small and the brethren are poor we must do the work gradually.

New Haven is one of the schools in Franklin county that never closes its doors and likely never will while F. P. Shelton and G. E. Jones are in charge thereof. The foreign element predominates in all that region and many of our most efficient helpers are such as were manifest the day of our Rally, beginning at nine in the morning and ending at ten at night. The membership is poor, but generous to a fault, always supporting our work, but this time more liberally than usual, and may the Lord bless them for it.

J. T. McGarvey is doing some good, genuine mission work for the school and church at Hurdland and the people appreciate it and are very hearty in doing what they can for themselves, while the children are going to see if they cannot come to our help this year.

Edina is the only school in Knox that gives to our work every year, rain or shine.



R. B. Havener is watching the work at Villa Ridge, anxious to see the house dedicated and the work under way by spring, and some in other parts do not understand why this is so difficult, but a few people with a foreign element all about them have a struggle of which you have no idea, and Villa Ridge and New Haven are the only two good congregations in Franklin.

Have not the space to tell you how they appreciated the work of Fred F. Schultz at Price's Branch, but his reorganizing their school in midwinter speaks for itself and its membership at the time of year shows their earnestness.

We want you to join our volunteer army, sending us one dollar for the work, taking fellowship with us in the cause of Christ. Will you?

A Letter From Armenia.

It was in August, 1883, that I visited this city while on my first missionary tour; remained two weeks, and baptized three women and sixteen men on their confessions, who were organized into a church founded upon the Apostle's doctrine. This church was visited twice by me since then, and three or four times by Bro. Kevoshian, and they grew in grace and the knowledge of the Lord as well as in numbers. Like the rest of their sister churches established throughout the country, they suffered the fiery trial through which the country passed a few years ago, and five of the most faithful brethren suffered martyrdom. Ever since this organization, those churches, feeling the need of a preacher, often appealed to us, but not having competent men to send to them they were left to themselves, except a few who were fortunate enough to employ such leaders as could be found. When an opportunity presented itself a few months ago, we considered it a providential call to remove for a time to this city to labor with the church, where we arrived on November 14, when some twenty-five brethren and sisters had come out in carriages to a distance of three hours to meet us. We were glad to find twenty-two brethren and twenty-one sisters in the church who were delighted to welcome us among them. In their day-schools also we found over one hundred boys and girls, where they have a man teacher for the boys and two female teachers for the girls. We were very glad also to find that they were living in peace with all the people, exercising a good influence over them.

Immediately after arrival our work with the church commenced and we feel greatly encouraged at the prospect of the work, both in the church and the school, and hope that the Lord will be pleased to bless our efforts in this city for his own glory if we faint not. On our way here we spent three nights with our dear co-laborer, Bro. Kevoshian in Tocat, where I could hardly believe mine own eyes, seeing a fine respectable set of twenty-nine men and women who were introduced to us as the members of the Church of Christ in Tocat. During the services on Lord's day these gathered together with a few outsiders to hear the preaching of the gospel in the neat, tastefully prepared chapel, fitted with comfortable benches for the people and a neat little pulpit for the preacher. He had also a large baptistry built in the ante-room through which is the entrance into the chapel proper. The house is located in a most suitable part of the city. It belongs to the heirs of an Armenian who, being pressed by hard times, are trying to sell it, and Bro. K. was feeling distressed that if the house be sold he would not be able to find another as suitable in the city if he was to pay twice the amount. The house and lot, which is a large, one can be bought, I think, for $1,500, which is not half its value in better times. The church in Sevas has a house of worship in a well located part of the city. The people sit on the floor. We brought with us from Constantinople twenty-nine American folding chairs, but they are too few for a crowd of about one hundred and more who attend the preaching. Standing almost at the threshold of a new year, yea, a new century, we trust in God and the prayers and encouragement of his people, laboring in hope, believing that our labors in the Lord are not in vain.

Old People's Home.

We expect to open our "Old People's Home" March 1st, having leased temporarily the best property we could for that purpose, thinking this a better arrangement than purchasing what, at best, would not meet our needs. Ere another year rolls round we hope to begin a "Home" from the foundation up and one that will reflect great credit on our brotherhood at large.

Already we have an organization of seventy-five members, eight life memberships, and expect to increase it week by week. Shall not everyone who reads this constitute himself a committee to add new names as charter members? We have had one gift of $2,250; another of $1,000, with offers from many to furnish rooms.

"Twenty years ago I wrote a poem of considerable length," said a caller in a newspaper office.

"Yes," said the editor.

"I brought it to this office, and you refused to publish it."

"Very likely."

"I remember that I mentally put you down then as an idiot who didn't know enough to ache when hurt."

"Naturally."

"Well, sir, I looked that poem over again the other day and made up my mind to come and see you about it."

"Yes."

"I have come to say that if I looked as green twenty years ago as that poem proves me to have been I want to thank you because you didn't cut me up and throw me as food to the cows. Good-day."

The editor drew a long chalk mark under the table. It was the first case in all his experience in which even twenty years had begotten the knowledge that it is sometimes necessary to be cruel to be kind.—N. Y. Observer.

Who Can Beat This? $112.15 Saved.

Dear Ed.:—

I read in your valuable paper how one of your subscribers made money in the plating business, but I can beat that and am only 23. I sent for a new Royal Silver Plater and have already saved $112.15. Can any of your readers beat this?

Every family has spoons, forks and jewelry to plate. Large things I send to the factory. There is plenty of goods to be plated in both city and country and there is no reason why any industrious person should be poor or out of employment when such an opportunity is at hand. My benefactor is PROF. GRAY, who runs a Plating Works at 23 Miami Building, Cincinnati, O., a responsible party who will give employment to several more persons who are willing to hustle. He does all kinds of plating and will teach you the business. As this is my first lucky streak I give my experience hoping others may be benefited as I was.

Christian Science is abroad in the land, seeking whom it may devour. It is the most stupendous fraud of the Nineteenth Century, yet so shrewd are its advocates and so thoughtless is the average man and woman, that tens of thousands have been deceived.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE DISSECTED is an antidote for Christian Science. It is a book by A. D. SECTOR, which tells what Christian Science is, in the plainest of language. Mrs. Eddy is shown to be a conscious fraud and a conscienceless charlatan and pretender. The book contains 62 pages, neatly printed and bound.

The Art of Self-Defense.

The popular idea expressed in the phrase, "the art of self-defense," shows the opinion that the chief enemies a man has to defend himself from are visible and external. But the real danger of every man is from minute and often invisible foes. In the air we breathe and the water we drink are countless minute organisms leagued against the health of the body.

The one defense against these enemies is to keep the blood pure. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery thoroughly purifies the blood, removing poisonous substances and accretions. When the blood is pure there is no harborage for the germs of disease which find a lodging only when the blood is impure and corrupt.

"I consider your 'Golden Medical Discovery' one of the best medicines on the face of the earth," writes Mr. Wm. Floeter, of Redoak, Montgomery Co., Iowa. "While in the southwest, three years ago, I got poisoned with poison ivy. The poison settled in my blood and the horrors I suffered cannot be told in words. I thought I would go crazy. I tried different kinds of medicine, tried different doctors, but all the relief they could give me was to make my pocket-book lighter. I then began taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Took four bottles without relief. Kept taking it. I took in all ten bottles and got entirely cured."

Industrial Schools for Negroes.

Ofttimes in our effort to aid a needy people we give them a "stone" and not a "fish." Education must be something sufficiently prized to be labored for or it is not a blessing. Industrial education not only teaches people how to work, but teaches them to work that they may be educated. I can give the readers of your paper no better idea of industrial training for the negroes and its results than by describing our methods at the Southern Christian Institute in Mississippi. Let it be remembered, however, that the condition of the negroes in the Virginias and in Kentucky and Missouri is not to be compared to their condition in the far south. In central Mississippi many negroes are found who are not much removed in intelligence from those who live in Africa. Their ignorance of the most common things connected with our civilization would surprise one who did not know that they have had scarcely a glimpse of our civilization.

These ignorant people come to us for an education. They have no money nor friends to aid them. Many come full grown who are not able to read at all. I saw in one of our primary classes a negro six feet and four inches tall. He afterwards became one of our good scholars and a fine workman. Those who are unable to pay tuition are divided into classes for work. We have now the following industrial classes: Farming, gardening, carpentry, cooking, housekeeping, sewing and printing.

Class in farming: This class is instructed in the very best methods of raising cotton, corn, sugar cane and sorghum and in the best methods of harvesting, etc., also in the making of molasses in our cane mill. The care of farming implements and the proper use of the best tools is included in the instruction, also the proper feeeing of stock and hogs. Last year this class raised twelve bales of cotton and eight hundred bushels of corn, besides other farm products. It fattened thirty head of hogs and a bunch of beef cattle. The cash income from its labor was $1,355.00, besides that which was consumed by the boarding students.

Class in gardening: This is a very important class, for it supplies very much of the produce consumed by the students, and in nothing do the negroes need instruction more than in truck-raising. The garden at the S.C. I. is a revelation to all in that part of the South, where they know nothing concerning variety of produce or a winter garden. The knowledge they get enables those who have a small piece of ground to greatly add to their table variety and to supply a large part of their living at small cost.

The class in carpentry: This class is taught the use and care of tools. It is instructed in millwork, in getting out flooring, siding, casing, etc., and in the principles of simple mechanics. It is taught how to properly erect buildings, and all in this line which will enable them to do whatever they are likely to be called upon to do in their surroundings. The boys instructed here are in great demand to build cabins and also to construct larger buildings for the white people. As a result the character of the buildings in that part of the south is being changed. You can tell a cabin built by one of our students about as far as you can see it. This class erects all our buildings, and does a good deal of work for the citizens of Edwards. Our college building at the S. C. I. cost us $2,000. The same building, put up by contract, would have cost $10,000. We bought the material direct from the sawmill; the railroads gave us half rates on freight; our mill planed the lumber and got out the siding and flooring and ceiling, and our boys did all the work. On account of this method our buildings at the S. C. I are worth more than our entire outlay at the Institution, including salary of teachers. The entire income from the school and plantation last year was $4,585 cash, besides the erection of a building.

The class in cooking: It is almost beyond belief how ignorant some of the girls who come to us are in regard to the names even of the most common things used in the kitchen. Yet these same girls go out to their life work good cooks—able to take positions in good families. This class does all the cooking for the Institution. We now have fifty students to feed. The same is true of the class in housekeeping—while they are getting an education they are doing the necessary work.

The class in printing: The printing department has grown until it has become one of the important industries. We are compelled to employ an experienced printer to take charge of this department. This affords a splendid drill for the students in spelling and writing and in correct composition. We are without a printer at present, and so cannot take nearly all the job printing sent us by the business men of Edwards. When fully equipped this department will be self-sustaining.

Each industrial student gets for the year's work $20.00 which provides clothing. They are all provided with a good place to sleep and with wholesome food. The next year they go to school and everything is provided—the first year's work paying tuition and board for the second year. Some remain with us six years and get a good common school education and learn three trades, and are so instructed as to be able to get on well themselves, and they naturally become leaders of their people. During all this time these students are under the influence and training of Christian people; nearly all become Christians. They are, as a class, easily controlled, and while the discipline must, of necessity, be strict, it is not hard to enforce.

It must be remembered that while we are giving instruction to those attending, we are building up a great institution. Two hundred and fifty acres of the eight hundred acres at the S. C. I. is yet to be redeemed from canebrake. This new land is of the very best; what is known in the south as second bottom, and will, in a good year, yield a ton of cotton to the acre.

I know of no better way of judging of the value of this work than by the estimate placed upon it by the white men in the community. Those in Edwards who in the beginning opposed it are now its warm friends. One merchant in Edwards gave me $200 toward the new college building, and said he gave it because the people educated at our school were the very best citizens among the negroes; honest, industrious and polite. Recently a man who was a captain in a Confederate army, and who lives near the S. C. I., came to get a superintendent for a plantation owned by him in Louisiana, and said he would send any one whom Professor Lehman would recommend, as he had noticed that the boys trained at the school were not only industrious but reliable. The school by its work has conquered.

This work, and all the work hitherto conducted by the Board of Negro Education and Evangelization, has been turned over to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Everybody knows it is in good hands. The C. W. B. M. has asked me to raise a fund to construct the buildings now needed at the S. C. I. At first all money raised for building purposes was used to purchase material. Now we must, out of it, pay a mechanic as instructor. Our building work for the next year is the erection of a boys' dormitory and a hospital. On account of the heavy demands made upon its treasury, the C. W. B. M. cannot furnish funds for this work; these must be raised. If they are not we must dismiss the instructor and discontinue the class and leave the school in great need of these buildings. Every available room is full of students now, and we are compelled to put six in some of the rooms. The friends of this cause are not going to see it retarded for lack of funds when so much is accomplished with the money intrusted to us.

I have not space to even mention the work done at the Louisville Bible School, farther than to state that all the preachers sent out from that school who are now filling pulpits in the south and doing evangelistic work are getting a living from their work, not one asking aid from the Board. Train the negro to do his work well and he will find support among his own people. C. C. SMITH.

The Doctor's Wife

Watches the Effect of Proper Feeding.

"I have an excellent opportunity to know of the effect of food in sickness, for my husband is a practicing physician and has been recommending Grape-Nuts food for some time. I have watched the result, and have never known a case where it has not given satisfaction.

"One instance will perhaps suffice to illustrate: A professor in the high school here was in very poor health from stomach trouble. He finally got into such a condition that he could not eat any food whatever without suffering, and was so greatly reduced in strength that he could hardly walk. He was put on Grape-Nuts food and gained rapidly and is now in good health. His cure was effected by the use of Grape-Nuts food." Mrs. Dr. Lyman, Croton, O.

Capper, of Louisville, Ky., as musical director, rendered valuable assistance. The church was well pleased with the services of both of the brethren.—R. W. WOODSIDE, pastor.

Eldorado, Kan., Jan. 15.—We have had 162 additions to the church since I came here nearly three years ago. The work is in fine shape. I am leaving.—E. E. COWPERTHWAITE.

Morrill, Kan. Jan. 14.—Assisting pastor I. A. Wilson in a meeting here; two confessions last night.—O. WILKISON.

Thayer, Kan., Jan. 20.—Bro. G. M. Reed has just closed a short meeting for us. Six were baptized, two by letter, one from the Church of God, making nine additions. The church is in best working order of its history. We are ready to employ pastor for half time, with churches near to co-operate with us.—C. T. WINTERS.

Brashear, Mo., Jan. 21.—Two reclaimed at regular services here yesterday. — R. A. MARTIN.

Crooked Lake, Mich., Jan. 14.—Organized in this place last night with 21 members. Four were formerly Disciples; eight by confession and nine from the denominations, making 21 in all.—R. BRUCE BROWN.

Jackson, Mich., Jan. 14.—Six confessions at the closing service of our three weeks' meeting. This makes 24 confessions to date.—JAMES EGBERT.

Carthage, Mo., Jan. 19.—Meeting 13 days old. Eighteen accessions. Will, God willing, continue for two weeks, then begin at Humboldt, Neb., about Feb. 3, then go to Centralia, Ill. W. A. Oldham has done a splendid work for the cause in this city.—BEN F. HILL AND GUY B. WILLIAMSON.

Joplin, Mo., Jan. 15.—During December we received 21 additions as follows: Letter 7, statement four, denominations two, reclaimed one, conversion seven. We had an excellent Christmas service for the children, an impressive watch service, and on Jan. 6 our annual meeting occurred. On this day the writer entered upon the third year of his ministry here and the church heard reports from her eleven departments of work. During 1900 the church raised and expended $4,326.93 and received 129 additions. $303.61 was given to missions. Our resident membership is now 453. We now look forward to the completion of our new building and the organization of a second church.—W. F. TURNER.

Marshfield, Mo., Jan. 16.—I am now in a meeting at Marshfield. Meeting 14 days old; 12 additions to church; outlook in south-west Missouri promising. We expect to reorganize church at this place.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

Neosho, Mo., Jan. 14.—Two baptisms not reported.—L. C. WILSON.

St. Joseph, Mo., Jan. 21.—The First Christian Church of this city begins to-day the fourth week of the meeting under the leadership and preaching of its pastor, C. M. Chilton. Result to date, 86 additions, with interest and congregation growing. For want of room many turned away last night.—J. C. WYATT.

St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 21.—Reports at the preachers' meeting Monday morning as follows: Mount Cabanne, 5 additions; 2 additions yesterday and 3 last Sunday not previously reported; Compton Heights, 3; First, 4; Beulah, 2 by letter, Bible-school attendance, 218; home department organized. E. J. Lampton, late of Louisiana, Mo., has preached the last two Sundays at the Tuxedo Church. E. M. Smith, of Centralia, Mo., and S. G. Clay, of Mexico, Mo., were present at the meeting.

Vandalia, Mo., Jan. 15.—I have closed my work at Vandalia, Laddonia and Union. Have had a pleasant work. We have had in all 123 accessions, 26 by letter, five reclaimed, six from other bodies and 86 by baptism. Have been here 21 months. I have begun my work at Louisiana, Mo., and found the congregation for which Bro. E. J. Lampton has labored for eight years, aggresive. Bro. Lampton retires from this field loved by everybody, without respect to church lines. The congregations where Bro. Lampton has labored are strongholds, towers of strength. That church is to be congratulated that secures the services of Bro. Lampton. I will move to Louisiana next month.—F. A. MAYHALL.

Blue Hill, Neb., Jan. 7.—Closed here with seven additions—three confessions, four from the Methodists.—O. WILKISON AND MCVEY.

Cozad, Neb., Jan. 16. — Dedicated the beautiful house here last Lord's day. All money raised in cash. Sixteen to date. Result of Posten-Dawes meeting across river. More to come. Closed with lecture Tuesday night in Opera House to help seat church.—ATWOOD AND WIFE.

Hampton, Neb., Jan. 14.—The meeting here is progressing slowly, the attendance and interest growing all the time. The spirituality of the church is low, not even breaking the loaf on the Lord's day. Bro. Whitacre, who is pastor for half time, is co-operating heartily and doing good work. We have had three additions by relation. Bro. Wickham is preaching the gospel with power.—R. A. GIVENS.

Akron, O., Jan. 15.—The First Church of Christ of this city began a meeting on Sunday, Jan. 13. J. E. Hawes is conducting the song service. Immense audiences the first day; five added, two by confession.—J. G. SLAYTER.

Canton, O., Jan. 14.—Splendid meeting here—68 additions to date; 18 added yesterday. Meeting continues indefinitely.—UPDIKE AND WEBB.

Chandler, Okla , Jan. 14.—We feel hopeful for the work here. Our only fear is that we have too much on our hands. We now have three other regular points at which we preach in addition to our three Sundays in the month here, with calls for protracted meeting work. Four additions yesterday, three confessions and one from the Methodists.—A. M. HARRAL.

Findlay, O., Jan. 17.—The work prospers. Thirty added in last thirteen weeks. Raised $2,726 in 1900; $400 for missions.—A. M. GROWDEN.

Special Dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

DAYTON, O., Jan. 21.—One hundred and twenty here to date; twenty-eight yesterday. Several hundred turned away from women's meeting yesterday afternoon. Interest intense.—WILSON AND HUSTON.

Salem, Ore., Jan. 11.—Three additions recently by letter. For the past year this church raised over $70 for Foreign Missions and $51 for the general board, not counting amounts raised by the Bible-school and the other departments. The Junior Endeavorers raised $39.53, nearly all of which was for the foreign work. We have established a Home department for the Bible-school and aim to reach every member that we cannot get to attend regularly.—P. O. POWELL.

Alleghany, Pa., Jan. 15.—We had three confessions in our Sunday-school on Jan. 5, (Decision Day). On Jan. 13, two baptisms and one confession in Sunday-school and six additions at regular services. Also two Dec. 20 and three Jan. 6.—H. F. NICHOLS.

Pittsburg, Pa.—During the past year the East End Christian Church, of which T. E. Cramblet is pastor, raised for all purposes nearly $9,000 and increased its membership from 374 to 505.

Scranton, Pa., Jan. 14.—Bro. Cobb began his revival meeting at Dunmore Church Jan. 6, and 14 confessions to date, most of them grown persons.—J. D. DABNEY.

Gainesville, Tex., Jan. 14.—The annual report of the Dixon St. Christian Church shows 273 additions for the year, $5,000 raised for all purposes, every cent of debt paid and money in the treasury. In the past 23 months 428 have been added to this church, making the present net membership 627. J. B. Sweeney has been unanimously called as pastor for the third year.

The Human Seasons.

Four seasons fill the measure of the year;
There are four seasons in the mind of man:
He has his lusty Spring, when fancy clear
Takes in all beauty with an easy span:

He has his Summer, when luxuriously
Spring's honey'd cud of youthful thought he loves
To ruminate, and by such dreaming high
Is nearest unto heaven: quiet coves

His soul has in its Autumn, when his wings
He furleth close; contented so to look
On mists in idleness—to let fair things
Pass by unheeded as a threshold brook.

He has his Winter too of pale misfeature,
Or else he would forego his mortal nature.

John Keats.

Pie.

I hold it to be a demonstrable truth that the freedom of the citizen and the highest commercial and intellectual eminence can only be attained where Pie is prominent as an article of diet. It may be said that these very British whom I condemn for their gross and sordid ideas of Pie lead the world for individual liberty, commercial supremacy and such achievements in philosophy and letters as are exemplified in the works of Herbert Spencer and Marie Corelli, but I maintain that it is possible for a people to possess a blessing and yet call it out of its name. Britons have pies, but, possessed by that exasperating combination of ignorance and bull-headedness which is their characteristic, they call them "tarts." Now, calling a pie a tart does not make it a tart any more than calling a rubber overshoe a "gum" can render that peculiarly Philadelphia expression, "I was cleaning my gums on the door-mat," other than shocking to the moral sense. In either case, the mistake is due to ignorance and parochial narrowness. If the British people had only gone to college they would know that "tart" comes from the Latin "tortus," meaning "twisted," and is correctly used only to describe a twisted ribbon of dough enclosing a form of jelly. Not even the most benighted islander thinks of calling it a "mince tart," and yet a mince pie is no more of a pie than an apple pie is. Both are constructed on precisely the same architectural lines. I call the attention of the citizens of the British Empire to this error of theirs. I don't want to have to speak to them again about it.

Though the derivation of the word "tart" is quite simple, it must be owned that "pie" will have to be given up as too hard to puzzle out. And this is strange because it is not an ancient thing, as anybody can see when he knows that so simple a dish as suet pudding was never heard of before the beginning of the eighteenth century. Puddings until then were always meat compounds boiled in casings like sausages. All persons are hereby warned away from supposing that Pie in the American sense has any connection with "pie: a magpie"; or "pie: the complex rules for the performance of the ancient breviary offices of the church," or "pi: a confused mixture of type." I seem to have read somewhere that mince pie was the father of all other pies, and was so named because it was such a mixture of things, but I am afraid this will hardly do. Etymology is not a guessing game, at least when it is played right. It seems to be settled that "pie" has to do with "pit" and "pot," but just what the connection is nobody knows.

When people saw a great light and apprehended that sweets are harmonious only with mildly acid and fragrantly pungent things, and not with salty and savory things, such as meat and soup greens, then Pie came into its own, and under its beneficent sway an immense mental, moral and spiritual uplift made itself felt immediately. The Declaration of Independence was the direct result, and all the heritage of liberty bequeathed to us in that instrument. Does anybody doubt that if the Southern people had been as great pie-eaters as the Yankees anything could have beaten them? How is it possible for seven Americans to fall upon 150 Filipinos at a wedding party, surround them and kill every one of them in the interest of sound and stable government unless it is that the American was nourished on pie and the Filipino was not? It is all very well to sneer, but how do you account for it otherwise? That's the question.

But apples! You take good, sharp, juicy winter apples and pare them and quarter and core them and slice them and strew them on the well-worked and well-shortened under-crust, made out of good winter wheat flour, and put in a little sweet butter and just enough sugar and a clove or two and nutmeg and cinnamon and maybe a little lemon peel and then fix on the cover and take a case knife and trim off the superfluous dough around the rim and pinch up the edge with your thumb and finger all around to make it look pretty and gash the top something like a leaf so as to let out the steam and then set it in an oven that bakes just right, top and bottom, and let it stay there till it browns the right shade, and I tell you you've got a pie that is a pie. And when ma opens the oven door to see how it is getting along, there is such a nice smell all through the house—wait a second till I swallow; I'm most choked—and it seems as if you couldn't wait till dinner time comes—oh, yes; I guess warm apple pie is about right. And cold apple pie can be got down especially if there is a piece of cheese on the plate beside it, the kind of cheese that is all crumbly and has about a million little stickers in it.

Apple pie is always in style. Go into a restaurant and ask for a "cut of standard" and the waiter will bring you a piece of apple pie. He knows what standard pie is. There are times in the year when other kinds make a spurt and run on ahead a little, but apple pie keeps jogging on, and by and by it overtakes them. In December mince pie is in the lead because it is near Christmas, and that is an orthodox Christmas article of diet. In November pumpkin pie had the call because it was Thanksgiving time. Next spring when pie-plant comes in—some people call it rhubarb, but that always sounds stuck-up, and like you were trying to show off—everybody will eat pie-plant because it is good for the blood. In the summer peach pie will forge way to the front, and I'll never tell you why. But, just as I say, apple pie keeps jogging on and in the long run wins the race. I mean the right kind of an apple pie. Once in a while you will meet somebody that is always trying to be different from anybody else and he will go on about English deep apple pie, and how much superior it is to the common, vulgar thing we eat because we don't know any better. Well, English deep apple pie is good; I don't deny that. It can't help being good. You cook apples almost any way, and they're not bad eating, but law me! when you put them in a crock and turn a little cup upside down in the middle of them and cover it all over with a lid of pastry, that isn't a pie at all. It's just stewed apples. Don't you see that you must have a bottom of pastry and that there is a just proportion of crust to filling that must not be deviated from one iota or your pie is inartistic and an offense against the laws of taste.

When one understands how Pie is the glad epiphany of the soul's yearning for beauty of living, as it were, the bud tip of a plant groping its way upward between the dull, hard clods to sunlight and the air, he understands also how some kinds of pie have a story to tell, a pathetic story for those who can appreciate.

In the early days of Ohio there was a vinegar pie. A paste was made of flour and water. Enough vinegar was added to give it a pleasant tartness and sugar was stirred in to suit the taste. Then this was used as a filling for the top and bottom crust. Smile, if you can, at this poor effort, but bethink you who it was that made it and where and why. We may set the scene in a log cabin in the wild woods of the Western Reserve and people it with settlers from Connecticut, an ambitious husband and his young wife who have left behind them the old folks at home, knowing that they will never look upon their faces more. They have come the long, long journey in their covered wagon to the far west of Ohio to seek a home in the wilderness. The Indians are but barely gone. The timber wolves still howl nights while the young mother hushes her babe to rest. In the twilight bears snuffle at the doorsill of the rude cabin. It was a sufficient shelter from the weather, but no rag carpet covered the puncheon floor to soothe the eye with its soft coloring, no pictures hung upon the mud-chinked wall of logs. There was no lack of food to eat. The virgin soil, never before turned by a plowshare, brought forth riotously. Standing at his door, the husband might kill wild turkeys with his rifle. There was game in plenty, deer and squirrels, 'possums, wild ducks, wood pigeons, and, once in a long while, a feast of that most highly prized of all meats, pork. Wild berries grew all about, and here and there upsprung a tree planted by Johnny Appleseed, ragged, wild enthusiast that he was, almost a legendary hero in his beneficent resolve to scatter far and wide over the new country the best fruit God ever gave to man. There was plenty to eat, but when at last the store of fruit for winter was exhausted, the soul sickened at the plenty of mere animal food.

uck them we used to git back hum," sighs the husband.

"Land sakes! Uriah Kinney! I ain't got one mortal thing I could make a pie aout o'," retorts the wife.

"No, I s'pose not. I ain't a-faultin' ye. I was unly sayin' I woosh't 'twas so't we could hev a pie luck them we used to git back hum. 'Twould kind o' seem more luck livin'."

Then the wife falls to biting the end of her forefinger. She plans; she meditates. Oh, woman of a thousand wonderful inventions! Something has got to give when thy brain throws its weight against a problem. Result in this instance, a vinegar pie.

"Gosh, Polly! This is lickin' good!" exclaims the husband, wiping his mouth with one hand while he holds out the other for a third piece of pie. (Crockery wa scarce in those days.) Then he spreads the news.

"By darn!" says he to the next man he meets, "my Polly Ann med a pie f' me day b'fore yistiddy was the all-firedest best pie I ever et."

"Sho!" doubts the man that hears him. "Can't git nup-pie this time o' ye'r. Frut's all gin aout."

"By darn! she med it anyhow," and he smacks his lips. "Smartest woman I ever see. Med it aout o' vinegar, she did. Tell yeou. Tetched the spot, it did."

"I want to know," says the other man admiringly. And he did. The recipe was passed around and vinegar pie spread like wild-fire to the southward, to the people that call a pail a bucket and a basin a pan, and where they have a letter "r" broad enough and flat enough to roll out pie crust on in case of an emergency. Years have passed, and with them the memory of that dear soul that first discovered vinegar pie; yes, even vinegar pie itself has passed away, too, save in the recollections of the older people, so complete is the triumph of the self-sealing fruit can. I have used the name of Kinney, but that was because I thought it sounded kind of Yankee, but I should like to know her real name, and where she sleeps, that I might stand beside that weed-grown hollow that was once a mound above her, that I might read the mossy epitaph on her leaning tombstone:

A Faithful Friend, a Mother Dear,
A Loving Wife, lies buried here.

I should like to lay a posy on that grave, a posy of old-fashioned single pinks and phlox and Sweet William, flowers that she knew and liked. I am sure she would know of it and appreciate it, though she would protest it wasn't worth while making a fuss about. Yet I know that somehow she would feel that the hard times she had when they were all down with the "fever 'n' ager," she and Jerushy and Uriah chilling one day and Adoniram and the twins chilling the next day, and the cows got lost in the woods, and nothing tasted good, and they were all so poorly, and the house looked like distraction because, seem-like, she hadn't the ambition to keep it picked up—that somehow all that hard time was being made up to her now. I just know she is in the Good Place, not so much because she discovered the vinegar pie, though that is much, but because I don't see how the Good Man could ever have the heart to turn away any woman that brought up a family in Ohio away back in the "airly days."—Harvey Sutherland in Ainslee's Magazine.

Why He Sang.

"Isn't it a grind, Phil?" asked one member of a college glee-club of another. "I don't see how you can give up your Sunday afternoons to that mission."

"It is exacting," replied Phil, "and at first I thought it a burden, but to tell the truth I've come to like it."

"Oh, I don't doubt it does good, but the thing that would trouble me most would be the character of their music—that cheap, commonplace sort of stuff, you know."

"Well," said Phil, "it isn't classic, I know, but it seems to be the kind that reaches those men and does them good, so I go ahead.

"I wonder at it, Phil, for your taste isn't of that sort."

Phil was silent a moment, and then, with heightened color and a lower tone, he said:

"I'll tell you what helped me to get over that. You know Professor Mason? Well, he plays for them. That man who has won honors at the conservatories abroad, and whose appreciation of good music is as much finer than mine as mine is than some of the men in the mission—he goes down there Sunday afternoon, after playing that magnificent organ at Grace Church in the morning, and sits down at that old pan of a piano, and plays those tinkling, cheap revival hymns, and puts his whole heart into it.

"I had some fine idea about the sacredness of art and all that, and was tempted not to go there and sing; but when I saw that man and heard him there, I gave it up. If he can stand it for the sake of the good he is doing, I guess I can."

And so Phil sang on. No one who knew him ever suspected that he had lost his love of good music. On the other hand, there crept into his work in the glee-club a certain richness that had not been there before. "I've learned something about putting my heart into the song," he explained, modestly, when a friend asked him about it.

There is a cheap and thin culture which educates one above the needs of other people; a deeper, truer culture brings a heart sympathy which puts one in touch with them without condescension. The girl who has been away to study music, and comes home with just enough education to despise the home choir in which she formerly sang, or the rickety little church organ which formerly she played, and the hymns which her parents love and which she formerly sang, has not had too much culture, but too little, and that of the shallow sort. The noted organist and popular teacher taught his pupils many lessons, but the best of all his teaching was that which he taught to Phil.—Youth's Companion.

Song to the Evening Star.

Star that bringest home the bee,
And sett'st the weary labourer free!
If any star shed peace, 'tis Thou
That send'st it from above,
Appearing when Heaven's breath and brow
Are sweet as hers we love.

Come to the luxuriant skies,
Whilst the landscape's odours rise,
Whilst far-off lowing herds are heard
And songs when toil is done,
From cottages whose smoke unstirr'd
Curls yellow in the sun.

Star of love's soft interviews,
Parted lovers on thee muse;
Their remembrancer in Heaven
Of thrilling vows thou art,
Too delicious to be riven
By absence from the heart.

The Regeneration of Aunt Martha.

Aunt Martha Ferguson was a widow. She was growing old and she was poor, abjectly poor. She had always been poor, not a single day of her sixty-five years of life had brought her the sense of completeness either in food or clothing. Her girlhood, that period when woman's nature by birthright alone demands something of completeness, was a memory of a desolate, sunless island, dotted with days of hard work, starvation diet, the cheapest of all cheap clothing, worn and worn, patched and darned, turned and mended, until the girl fingers with the daily manual labor were curved and twisted and calloused, the large joints prominently in evidence, until the hands were as the hands of a world-weary, work-worn old woman. When her parents died leaving her alone, she inherited the little one-room cabin and single acre of sterile ground in the suburb of a quiet New England village. With a few hens, one cow and the truck patch she took up the burden of life.

In a couple of years she married Jason. He was a weaver, poor as Martha and a cripple. Up to their full strength the pair were industrious and honest. In the course of time two children were born to them, frail inheritors of the kingdom of abject poverty. The maternal heart was warmed with their coming, for no true woman ever passes the sacred threshold of maternity without joy and hope.

The coming of the children added to the cost of living, while the earning capacity could not be increased. Jason's health was failing. Martha's energies were all redoubled. At this time the way was sore, indeed. Soon the children faded away and died, and in a few years Jason's grave was made with theirs in the little "God's acre" on the knoll just above the cabin, and Aunt Martha was bereaved and desolate and alone.

In the village, now grown to be a very thriving town, lived Dr. Johnson and his wife Mary. The Doctor was a retired physician, the children were all reared, educated and settled in life, so the Doctor took an inventory of his effects and said to his wife:

"Mary, we have so much, in all. Our comfortable, full living will cost so much annually. There will remain so much. We will distribute judiciously among the worthy poor."

Mary said: "Amen! Papa, so let it be."

The Doctor and his wife decided to spend the whole, long summer at the seashore among the ocean breezes. The next morning after so deciding, Mary said at breakfast, "Doctor, let us fix Aunt Martha up and take her with us."

The moisture sprang into the Doctor's good old eyes and lifting his hand to his face he looked across the table to her who for forty years had been his other and better self and said: "Mother, mother, God bless you for the thought, we will."

And they did. Aunt Martha was dazed, shaken, when they told her of their plans. Every grace of life, every thought of comfort, every dream and hope of such clothes as other women wore, every vision of a day of rest, had been buried long, long ago under the Juggernaut of poverty. When she was told that the neat shoes, the four black dresses of good material and the bonnet with actual silk ribbons and modest flowers were all her own, she went hastily up to the graves on the knoll and cried as she had never cried before in all her desolate years. By and by the glinting sunshine came to her with a new and strange beauty. The opening leaves, and the fresh green grasses wanted speech with her, for the old heart's resurrection had begun.

They arrived at the seaside resort in the dusk of evening and, although it was full moon, the Doctor said, "We will wait until morning to show her the sea."

Just before the sun rose, they took their places on the beach, Aunt Martha sitting, the Doctor and his wife on either side. Standing the Doctor spoke in hushed tones, "Now, Aunt Martha, look straight before you and see the sun rise."

The old frame began to quiver, the knotted hands were folded closer around the thin chest, the head began to uplift, the nostrils to distend, the eyes to grow large and luminous. Just then the sun, a great ball of liquid gold and topaz, leaped out of the midst of the sea, and underneath and beyond and around and above was only space—limitless, boundless space. The Doctor and his wife stood to one side and half in front to see the face and hear the speech of wonder and surprise. The face was as the face of one raised from the dead. They heard the speech, but 'twas not what they expected.

"Thank God, I have seen something once that there's enough of!"

So Aunt Martha was born again. The Doctor silently took Mary's hand: "Mother, please God, if our lives are spared, there will be more Aunt Marthas born into the kingdom of rest and comfort."

"THE DRUMMER."

Make Life Miserable

IT'S THE LITTLE THINGS THAT DO SO.

How frequently you hear people complain of "only a slight case of piles," often claiming that the trouble is merely temporary, induced by costiveness, or sedentary habits.

It may be some satisfaction to console yourself in this way, but it is much better to check the trouble at once. You can't do it too soon.

In time these little rectal tumors will grow from the size of a grape seed, until a knot of them results as large as pigeon's eggs.

These become inflamed and tender to the touch and causing itching, stinging and throbbing pain.

Thus the disease continues from bad to worse until the patient can bear the annoyance no longer.

The Pyramid Pile Cure is a perfectly safe and certain cure for piles in any of these stages. It goes to the very source of the trouble and drives out all inflammation, causing the tumors to subside and the membranes to resume their normal, healthy condition.

Piles lead to too many complications to trifle with every remedy that comes along. People have found it pays to use a standard remedy like the Pyramid Pile Cure which for ten years has been tested in thousands of cases.

Physicians use the Pyramid Pile Cure in preference to surgical operations, because they know it contains no cocaine, morphine or poisonous drug and because it is no longer an experiment.

The Pyramid Pile Cure is in suppository form to be used at night and causes no detention from business. is painless and costs but 50 cents at any drug store in the United States and Canada.

A Practical Saving.

It is an important matter in the home to know how to best care for the things which are necessary to health and hygiene, for they are very necessary requsites and need to be considered in every home. Bacteria and disease germs multiply rapidly if brushes and combs are left to gather dust, oil and all kinds of things, hence the knowledge of the proper care in regard to them is very essential. Perhaps my simple method may be of service to those who read this little article. It is simple but safe, and cleans quickly and is easily dried and ready to use in a little while.

To wash them properly, fill a basin full of warm water (not hot) and add a tablespoonful of pearline and dip the bristle part of the brush into it, quickly moving up and down until clean, then rinse in cold water and shake dry. Clean the silver part with a little whiting and a chamois skin. The comb must be washed in the same kind of warm suds.

Brushes and combs washed thus will last for years, but hot water makes the the bristles fall out. The comb must be dried on a soft cloth, so as to keep it from warping. The teeth will warp at once unless dried immediately. One makes a great mistake to let the brushes and combs harbor dust and diseaso germs and convey them to the scalp and make trouble. S. J. H.

Worth Remembering.

Wrap cheese in a cloth wet in cider to prevent molding.

Dip a bit of parsley in vinegar and eat to sweeten the breath and remove odor after eating onions.

If brass or copper, after cleaning, is rubbed with soft newspapers it will look much brighter and keep clean much longer.

Add a little turpentine to the water with which the floor is scrubbed. It will take away the close smell and make the room delightfully fresh.

The best remedy against ants is cayenne pepper. Spread it on the shelves of the store closet under the paper that covers them.

A sprinkling of coarse salt on the sidewalks and driveways will destroy grass and weeds.

Marks that have been made on paint with matches can be removed by rubbing first with a slice of lemon, then with whiting, and washing with soap and water.

A solution of soda and water, applied with a whisk-broom, kept for the purpose, will remove the brown streaks in bathroom bowls made by sediments in the dripping water.

For pineapple lemonade boil a pound of granulated sugar in a pint of water until it forms rather a thick syrup, removing all scum as it rises. Squeeze the juice from three large lemons into a bowl, and peel a good-sized pineapple. Cut out the pineapple eyes, and grate it into the bowl with the lemon-juice. As soon as the syrup is clear pour it into the bowl and briskly stir the whole for two or three minntes. Cool for a couple of hours. Add a quart of iced water, strain the beverage into a small punch-bowl or into a pitcher.

An Awful Calamity.

"It came out as I journeyed on horseback through Dakota that almost every settler's land was under mortgage," said a westerner, relates the Washington Post, "and one day when I came upon a pioneer seated on the grass by the roadside with a troubled look on his face, I asked him if it was the mortgage he was worrying about.

"'Wuss than that, stranger,' he replied as he looked up wearily.

"'Sickness or death in the family?'

"'Wuss than that.'

"'Then it must be a calamity, indeed. You didn't lose family and home by a prairie fire?'

"'Nope; but you are right about its being a calamity. I've been trying to think of that word for two hours past. Yes, sir; you can put it down as an awful calamity.'

"'But won't you explain,' I persisted.

"'I will, sir. Thar was a mortgage on the claim, and I was a feelin' as big as any of my neighbors and takin' things easy when my wife was left $600. Stranger, dare I tell you what she did with that money?'

"'She didn't lose it?'

"'No, sir. She jest paid the mortgage, bought two horses and a plow, and this mornin' I was bounced out of my own cabin bekase I wouldn't peel off my coat and go to work! Yes, sir, you are right. It's a calamity—a calamity that's landed me on the outside, and between my great pride and her blamed spunk somebody'll be eatin' grass afore Saturday night!'"

THE

Christian Lesson Commentary—1901

THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY, by W. W. Dowling, is the very best Sunday-school "help" published for Superintendents, Teachers and Advanced Pupils. For many years our leading Sunday-school workers have chosen it in preference to all others. The volume for 1901 is better than ever before. It is a handsome volume of 429 pages. It includes practical expositions of the International Lessons for 1901, numerous maps, chronological tables of the Life of Jesus and of the Old Testament, a Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names, with their pronunciation and meanings, blackboard designs, numerous illustrations, etc., etc. If you are a Sunday-school teacher you owe it to yourself and to those whom you teach to equip yourself with the very best helps, and the best help, after the Bible, is THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY. This book is handsomely and substantially bound in cloth, stamped with black and gold. It is now ready for delivery. You should secure your copy in good season, that you may prepare for the first Sunday of the New Year.

The Advance Society.

I have so many letters to print this week from our members that I am afraid all cannot crowd in; especially if I keep on taking up so much room doing the talking myself. I wish to say that there has been a brisk guessing on my story "Pete," as to who Nap may be. Remember, the one who first guesses it will be presented with my historical novel, "Shem." I will not print the guesses already made, but will keep them in a safe place that they may be judged all together. So let everybody make a guess, whether you are a member—or whatever you are. I wish those who have not yet joined the Advance Society would reflect that this is the first year in a new century (according to a great many wise people), and that they ought to make an advance step in improving themselves, in making themselves cultivated and refined. Why not celebrate the twentieth century by joining the Advance Society?

Luella Evans, Brooks, Ia.: "I am sorry I ever stopped the rules of the Av. S., but I did. Last fall we traveled from here to Oklahoma in a covered wagon and could not take any history to read, but a Testament. I am going to begin over again. I am 13 and a member of the Christian Church. If we read five pages of history, 30 lines of poetry, a Bible verse each day, learn a quotation a week, keep account of what we read and learn, what is it that we have to report to you? Please send me a sample. My brother Fred and my sister Sarah have begun the Av. S., also." Frances Armstrong, Cedar Rapids, Ia.: "I would like to join the Av. S. I do not understand about the quarters. Please tell about them." In answer to the foregoing: When any one has kept the five rules for twelve weeks, he has kept them for one quarter. In that case, he writes to me, stating exactly what and how much he has done. It is not necessary to copy out the quotations, but you must tell the authors. However, it is good practice to send the quotations, also, if you have time. As a sample, I give this report from Gerald Dever and his mother: "Life of Moody, 94 pages; Bible, 84 chapters; Paradise Lost, 959 lines. Gems learned"—here follow all twelve, from which I select this, from Bulwer: "'Nothing can constitute good breeding that has not good nature as its foundation stone.' Books read this quarter" (this is extra work) "Sophomores of Radcliffe (Kellogg), The Little Lame Prince (Muloch), Transformation of Job (Fisher)." Mrs. Dever adds: "This last is especially fine, and can be had of David Cook, Chicago, for five cents." Edna Bernice Huston, Carthage, Ill.: "I am a little girl, 12 years old, and I go to church and Sunday-school every Sunday. I would like to join your Av. S., and will try to live up to the rules. I read the Red Box Clew; I read 'Pete,' and like both very much." Chas. K. Brewster, Oakesdale, Wash.: "My Aunt Vina takes the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and I have been reading the children's letters and 'Pete.' I like it so much. I wish to join the Av. S. I am 10. I go to school every day, and I enjoy it." Bertha Seelinger, Butler, Mo.: "I think 'Pete' is fine; I can hardly wait for the paper to come again. I am only nine, but I can read the story and understand it well. It is the first story I ever read in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, but mamma says that the Red Box Clew was fine." Waverly Rodecker, Pittsburg, Ill.: "I have read the children's page since it began. I wish to become a member of the Av. S. I also send my friend's name, Josie Jeffs, who is 12. I am 10. I was afraid I couldn't guess who the tramp was, so I ordered a book of Shem. I think 'Pete' is fine. Do you still think you will have the Red Box Clew printed in book form?" (Yes, some day.) Bertha Underwood, Boyd, Ore.: "I joined the Av. S., but did not keep the resolutions. I will start in again to-day. I will try hard. I wish to be a member, may I? I am 14. My brother Edward (12) and my sister Jessie (9), wish to join." (We are very glad to have this little band in Oregon.) Flossie Hunt, Le Roy, Ill.: "I am 14. I want to join the Av. S. I am much interested in the story of 'Pete.' I take the story over to the schoolhouse every week, and our teacher reads it to the children. They are much interested in it, so is our teacher. I will tell you what I got Christmas; a new dress, a box of letter paper, a ring, a new hair ribbon, a handkerchief, a brooch. I am going to begin the five resolutions to-day. I think 'Pete' was a brave girl." Bertha M. Beesley, Moselle, Mo.: "I do not like the tramp very well. Charlie Hancock will not be on the Honor List; he has broken the rules. But he is going to begin again. Wishing you all a happy new year, I remain a firm friend of the Av. S." Florence Belle Beattie, Dover, Mo.: "Auntie and I still want to be on the Honor List; we have kept the rules. Be sure and tell me what old Santy brought you. I hope it was a great big present. Please tell me your birthday and oblige your little friend." (Old Santy treated me quite respectfully, although he didn't bring me a new dress, hair ribbon, brooch or ring. The members of two of my classes that I teach here in the college, threw in and bought me one of the latest books, a great big one with more than 400 pages in it. He also brought me a box of homemade candy all the way from Kentucky, and another from Clinton county, and a box of fine candy from this very city where I live. So I ate candy a good deal, and I expect I got pretty sweet toward the last; at least I felt kinder funny and unusual. And February 11th is the date I honored by being born on. Do not ask me the year, I have sensitive feelings.) Maud Braley, Puxico, Mo.: "I like 'Pete' just fine. I wish somebody would write to me, I would answer immediately. I am the only one here that belongs to the Av. S., so I don't see a nice time about it. This summer we lived on a farm and I couldn't study much. Now we live in town I will try to do better. I am 12." Julia Cox, Cox, Mo.: "My favorite quotation is:

"'Do you covet learning's prize? Climb her heights and take it.
In ourselves our fortune lies—Life is what we make it.'

"I do not know the author. Can any of the members tell? If I don't guess who Nap is, what is the price of Shem?" (50 cents.) Well, I am obliged to save over a lot of letters till next month: none of them will be lost, however, or fail to appear.

Honor List.—Florence B. Beattie and her auntie (2nd quarter); Burleigh Cash, Pennville, Ind., (9th quarter); Julia Cox (9th quarter); Lola Cox (8th quarter); Mattie Upton, Houstonia, Mo., (8th quarter); Gerald and Mrs. Dever, Hume, Ill., (9th quarter); Bertha M. Beesley, Moselle, Mo., (8th quarter). Note.—Mattie Upton explains how two of her reports come so close together. I will give her letter next month. Dear children, don't expect me to answer private letters, unless you send stamps. Up here in Albany they charge for stamps like anything!

Nobody has answered who wrote the poem about Tim Turpin.

Election Episodes.

At a place called Beccles, during the recent English elections, a voter was observed going to the polls in a donkey-cart. The donkey was profusely decorated with the Radical colors, while the voter wore a Tory rosette. Challenged as to this seeming inconsistency, he cheerily replied:

"Oh, I'm going to vote for F., the Conservative candidate; my donkey's for S. (the Radical); but then he's an ass."—Youth's Companion.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

It was afternoon of Tuesday in Passion Week, and the ministry of Jesus in Jerusalem was ended. For three days had he spoken in parable and exhortation, seeking to arouse the people and their leaders to a consciousness of their sin in rejecting the divinely appointed Messiah, but all in vain. Sadly he saw the tide turning against him, and realized that the hatred of the scribes and Pharisees would speedily culminate in his death. He could not leave the holy city without exposing to the multitude the hollow mockery of the Pharisaism which they had chosen in preference to his sincere and lofty teachings. In words that yet burn with the fire of holy indignation he consumed the flimsy garment of their self-righteousness, and exposed in all its naked ugliness the hypocrisy of the false teachers of Israel. The 23rd chapter of Matthew is the most notable example of eloquent denunciation in all literature, yet its bitter scorn is surcharged with an unutterable sorrow, and a pity that finds expression in the closing words of lamentation over wayward Jerusalem.

As the little company left the temple courts, to make their way across the Kedron valley and over Olivet to Bethany, Jesus was asked to observe the beauty and magnificence of the mighty structure and its adornings. He sadly responded that the time would come when it should be utterly destroyed. When they had reached one of the western spurs of Olivet, and were seated where they could look over the city as they rested, the disciples asked Jesus to tell them privately when these awful events should transpire, and what should be the signs of his coming and the consummation of the Jewish age. His reply is found in the wonderful discourse of Matthew, 24th chapter, and the parallel parts of Mark and Luke. He tells them how they may know when the national overthrow is at hand, and bids them be prepared for night when it shall draw near. As for his own personal return, the Master says only that they must be ever ready, for the time no man knows, not even himself. He enforces his exhortation by the parable of the faithful servant, whose master rewarded him because he found him watching. It is at this time, while seated on the slope of Olivet, and surrounded by his bewildered disciples, that Jesus delivers the wonderful discourse of the 25th chapter of Matthew, in which the parable of the virgins is found. Its lesson is the same that has been suggested, and its beauty and simplicity almost forbid the attempt at explanation. It is like the rose, whose beauty and fragrance are destroyed by being taken to pieces.

I shall not do this lovely parable the injustice of seeking in each detail some subtle, spiritual lesson, as is done by many fanciful commentators, but seek at once the plain and practical meaning which it had in the mind of the Master when he spoke it. Primarily it dealt with the strange unreadiness of Israel to receive the Messiah, for whose coming the nation had been waiting and praying through ages of bitter oppression and bondage. When her glorious bridegroom came she had not the oil of holiness in her heart, from which the flame of faith could be kindled, and her day of grace had passed by unheeded. "It ought to have been the fair city's bridal day, when she should have been married to the Son of God, but the pallor of death was on her face. He who would have taken her to his heart, as the hen gathers her chickens under her wings, saw the eagles already in the air, flying fast to rend her in pieces." But it has its lesson for us to-day, which we will do well to heed.

The picture is of an oriental marriage, with its processions and feasting, occupying then, as now, a large place in the social life of the people. A company of young maidens, friends of the bride, are appointed to go out to meet the bridegroom, and escort him to the home of the bride. "Five of them were wise, and five were foolish." In what did this distinction consist? Plainly, in the thoughtfulness of the former and the carelessness of the latter. The wise had provided themselves with oil for their lamps in sufficient quantity to last through the night, if the bridegroom should tarry so long. The foolish virgins were expecting him at once, and made no preparation beyond the present hour. The wise ones could safely sleep, when wearied with their waiting, for they had ensured themselves against surprise. The faithful disciple of Jesus is not required to be ever thinking of his Master's return, to the neglect of the daily duties of life. While Jesus tarries we must attend to our proper tasks, whether these be in the prayer-meeting or on the farm; in the pulpit or the shop; on the mission field or in the nursery. We may be asleep when he comes, but if the vessels of our hearts are full of the faith and love that are the fruit alone of loyal service, his approach will be welcome. "Whether we wake or sleep, we shall live together with him." There is a sleep of carelessness, from which we wake only to dark despair. There is a sleep of trust, that follows duty done, from which we rise to confident expectation of peace and happiness.

At midnight a cry was heard, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." He had tarried long, but not too long for the wise, who had faithfully prepared the needed oil in their vessels. To the foolish virgins, who asked a share in their oil to feed their own expiring lamps, they could but answer that their store was only sufficient for themselves. How many have sought, in the hour of approaching death, to feed the lamp of their own Christless lives from the oil of other consecrated souls. A husband may have scorned the Christian trust of his devoted wife so long as life and health were given him, only to covet it when eternity rose upon his vision, and to long with unavailing desire that he might somehow transfer to himself her virtues. Too late! Health cannot be acquired in a day, after disease has rioted for years within the body. Holiness cannot replace sin at the mere wish. Deathbed repentance gives but scant comfort to the soul that has spent the whole life in the service of Satan. There is, as has been said, one case of pardon for deathbed repentance in the Scriptures, that none need despair; and but one, that none may presume. Jesus says, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and sup with him, and he with me." How can we dare to let him knock in vain at our poor doors, and yet hope that our knock, when terrified by the approach of death, will admit us to the eternal joys of paradise? Magnify divine love as we will, we must realize that it is taking a fearful risk to thus trifle with truth and duty. The history of those who professed repentance in view of anticipated death, who afterwards recovered, shows that in most cases they were only frightened into making promises which they utterly failed to keep. Why not turn to the Lord now, when life is at its best, and when you have strength and many years to give to the Lord? Even if the heavenly bridegroom shall prove more merciful than he of the parable, yet it will be a deeper joy to go into his presence feeling that you have done your best in preparing for his coming. The lighthouse is not built upon the rocks for the purpose of telling the mariner how he should navigate among the breakers, but to warn him from entering into danger, and to indicate where the safe channel may be found. Such lessons as those of this parable are not told us to indicate definitely the proper way in which to act when opportunity has been despised; but rather to warn us against letting the opportunity go by unused. "To-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." "Behold, now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." This is the lesson for us all, as taught by the parable of the Ten Virgins. If we can persuade the children in our Sunday-schools to fill their minds with Christ's truth, their hearts with his love, and their lives with his service, they will not be surprised with empty vessels when the bridegroom comes, whether his approach be by day or by night.

Burris A. Jenkins.

TOPIC FOR FEBRUARY 3.

Christian Endeavor Day.

(Josh. 1: 1-11.)

A brave amount of work was done by Moses in the period of the Exodus; but at his death there remained yet much land to be possessed, much to be done. So, a brave work has been done by the church in the nineteenth century; but there remains yet much to be accomplished by the new century, the new generation.

In all the great stores of the cities, when the Christmas buying was over, and the employees who had worked night and day for a fortnight were relieved from the pressure of the purchasers, immediately the firms began taking inventories, and the employees were at work again for another fortnight night and day. So, is it not worth while in the great store of Christian Endeavor at this New Year's season to take account of stock?

Christian Endeavor has had a marvelous experience. It has marched like the hosts of Joshua across Jordan, round about the great city of the world's Jericho, and before the conquering multitude walls have fallen down. It is perhaps not inappropriate at New Year's for us to ask, What of Christian Endeavor to-day, and what of its future?

All that it has done we know well. It has revived flagging zeal; it has bound to the church many who might otherwise have been lost to it; it has helped to hold the young at that very period of life in which it is most difficult to keep their allegiance to religion and the church; it has contributed greatly to the unity of spirit among the several members of Christ's body—the church; it has aroused the church to unwonted missionary activity.

All that it is now doing is not so easy to declare. It is a vital part of our church life which can only be estimated in importance after it has been taken away. Like the heart or the lungs, its presence in the sound, healthy body is scarcely appreciated, unless disease lays hold of it. The C. E. Society is a very real source from which the pastor draws assistance; it is still, as it has been for years, a training school for the workers of the church. It may not be so effervescent as in former times; its enthusiasm may flow quieter and possibly deeper than at its inception; its work may often be directed rather toward a studious enlightenment on biblical and religious matters than hitherto; many changes such as these may have taken place on the surface of Christian Endeavor; but vitally it is still the same strong, sane, spiritual force that it has ever been.

What the future of the movement is to be is hid, of course, from all but God to know. That its influence can never die is proven by the eternal character of many and many a truth. No great and good crusade but goes marching on, in its effects, forever. But in a more concrete manner than that, it seems to most of us, C. E. is destined to live and to work in the minds and hearts of young people. Like the flag of the Union, the flag of C. E. shall not come down. "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon," said the Lord to young Joshua, "to you have I given it."

Only certain things are to be observed by the young Joshua Endeavor if it shall inherit the blessing of the older Moses:

1. He must be strong and of a good courage. No holding back, no feeble lack of valor. God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest.

2. Turn not away from the pledge given by our predecessors in the work—neither to the right hand nor to the left.

3. The Book of God is not to depart out of our hand day nor night, nor out of our mouth.

4. The Spirit of this Book must shape our lives.

BURROWS.

Ruth G. Glaspell was born near Cincinnati, Ohio, Nov. 1, 1823. The family emigrated westward in 1838, settling at Davenport. They were staunch Disciples and the following year when the church was organized the father and mother and two daughters became charter members. For 61 years and more, with the exception of two years in Madison County, Ia., she was a most devoted and faithful member. She was the last of that heroic band of 22 who planted and watered the cause in Davenport and Scott county. In 1848 she was married to Lewis W. Burrows. For over 50 years they lived on the homestead near Davenport. They were equally devoted to the church, to their children, of whom two sons and two daughters survive them and to each other. Bro. Burrows passed away about 10 months before "Aunt Ruth." The burial was at Davenport, the services being conducted by the writer. C. C. DAVIS.

LAPHAM.

Bro. A. E. Lapham, M. D., was born in Barry County, Michigan, Oct. 1, 1835, died in Kensington, Kan., Dec. 2, 1900, at the age of 65 years, 2 months and 1 day. He was married three times. To his first wife, Miss Arloa L. Burdick, July 4, 1857, who died Dec. 3, 1865. He married his second wife, Miss Elizabeth Mann, Feb. 7, 1867, who died Jan. 10, 1871. July 23, 1874, he married his third wife, Miss Susie Goings, who still survives him. Bro. Lapham gave his heart to Christ in early youth. He came to Kansas in 1871; he practiced medicine for more than 30 years, and a great portion of this time he preached on Sunday and often at other times. His life was a very active life. He wore himself out by hard labor and was a great sufferer the last year of his life. But his faith in God was strong. He died as he lived, trusting in Jesus and confident of eternal life through the blood of a crucified Redeemer. He was always ready to engage in every good work to help the cause of the Master. I talked with him a few hours before he passed away. He seemed almost insensible to the outer world and the material things about him, but when I spoke to him of the future life and the blessed promises of the Savior, he seemed to comprehend the spiritual side of life and expressed himself clearly on his faith and hope of eternal life in the spirit land. Almost his last words were, "Jesus will never forsake us if we put our trust in him." He often stated during his sickness that he was ready to go when the Master called. He was not afraid of the dark river; death was only a door open to a higher life where the soul is delivered from bondage to enjoy the freedom of heaven. He leaves a loving, faithful wife and six children to mourn his departure. The funeral services were conducted by R. M. Baily, of Kensington.

PRUSIA.

Sister Candace A. Prusia, wife of E. C. Prusia, died very suddenly of heart failure, at her home near Odebolt, Sac County, Ia., Sunday morning, Jan. 13, 1901. The deceased was born in Ottawa, Ill., Nov. 2, 1863, and was married to E. C. Prusia at Voltaire, Kan., October 31st, 1887. She confessed her faith in Christ and was baptized at Schaller, Ia., in 1899. She lived an exemplary Christian life, and was prepared for the sudden call. She leaves a husband and three children to mourn the irreparable loss A large concourse of sorrowing friends attended the funeral services which were conducted by the writer at Odebolt, January 13th.

THE CAMPBELL LIBRARY

TEN DOLLARS TIME PAYMENTS

This is an offer that we deem worthy to start off a new year and a new century. During the year 1900 we sold a great many sets of Alexander Campbell's Works, but we know that there are yet thousands of persons who should have these books who have not yet secured them. It is to these that we now appeal. To the set of Campbell's Works we have added two volumes (see list below), which naturally belong with The Campbell Library. The price of Campbell's Works is $8.00. By adding these two volumes the price is made $10.00—thus permitting The Campbell Library to be purchased on the Instalment Plan. The Library contains the following works:

The Christian System.
Popular Lectures and Addresses.
Lectures on the Pentateuch.
The Christian Baptist.
Evidences of Christianity.
Living Oracles.
Christian Baptism.
Campbell-Purcell Debate.
Letters to a Skeptic.
Life and Death.
Sermon on the Law.
Life of Alexander Campbell.
By T. W. GRAFTON.
Alexander Campbell's Theology.
By W. E. GARRISON.

Three of the works are pamphlets; all the rest are splendid volumes, bound either in cloth or leather. The price that we ask is very low for such books. Until a few months ago Campbell's works sold much higher. We made a substantial cut in prices, that the works might have a larger circulation.

EASY TO BUY. Any person who desires the Campbell Library may easily secure it. Any person favorably known to us, or who can give good reference, may purchase it by paying $2.00 down and $2.00 per month for four months. If you wish to take advantage of this plan notify us, and we will send you an agreement to sign. When you return the agreement, with first payment of $2.00, we send you the books, prepaid.

THE CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, 1522 LOCUST STREET, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Book Notes.

At the rate of about ten per day, our readers are ordering The Campbell Library on the installment plan. When our wonderful offer becomes generally known through the brotherhood, the orders will come much faster. We repeat the offer this week on this page. This is certainly a golden opportunity for those who wish to secure the works of the "Sage of Bethany." Any one can pay $2.00 down and $2.00 per month for four months.

But The Campbell Library is not the only thing that we sell on installments. Any person favorably known to us, or who can furnish first-class reference or endorsement from responsible parties, can buy any of the books that we publish, except music books, on the installment plan, provided the order amounts to $10.00 or more. We make the terms very easy and charge no interest on deferred payments. If you wish to secure books in this way, select from our catalogue what you want, and send us the list. We will fill out and send to you for your signature a form of agreement. If the terms suit you, you sign the agreement and return it to us, with the amount of the first payment, on receipt of which we send you the books. Do not write us that you want to buy "some books" on the installment plan and "please send me blank agreement." As we make the terms, we must fill out the agreement, and to do this, we must know what books you wish to purchase.

Next in popularity to The Campbell Library comes the Standard Dictionary. We offer the regular $26.00 edition, two volumes, bound in full morocco or full russia, for $13.00—$3.00 down and $2.00 per month for five months. Is it any wonder that the offer is popular? The Standard Dictionary is admitted by leading scholars to be the finest lexicon of our language ever published. No home should be without a first-class dictionary, and there will never be a better opportunity to secure the best than we are now offering.

If you desire to secure The Controversial Library you must hasten to send your order, as the offer expires February 1. This is the last call, the last time we shall direct your attention to it. This set of books should occupy a place in your library beside The Campbell Library and The Biographical and Historical Library which you secured—or should have secured last November. These three sets of books are necessary to every intelligent Disciple who has an active interest in the history and genius of our plea.

Christian Endeavor societies are now securing new quantities of topic cards, pledge cards, invitation cards, application cards and other supplies for the new year. The Christian Publishing Company carries a full line of these supplies at very low prices. The price-list is published, from time to time, in this paper, or will be sent on application.

We are still receiving many orders from our Special Christmas Catalogue. In this pamphlet were a great many bargain offers of standard works of literature at nominal prices, which proved very attractive to our patrons. We announce again that these offers are still open and will remain good until further notice to the contrary is given.

Is your church needing contribution envelopes, record books, treasurer's book, communion wine, communion ware, music books, pulpit Bible, or anything else in the way of church supplies? If so, write for our General Catalogue. We handle only the best of all church supplies, at very moderate prices.

Alexander Campbell's Theology is proving to be one of the most popular books published during 1900. Everywhere it is being enthusiastically commended as a most helpful volumn, not only for the preacher, but for every active Disciple of Christ who wishes an intelligent understanding of the "Reformation of the Nineteenth Century." It is a handsome, cloth-bound volume, sent, postpaid on receipt of $1.00.

Among our Advertisers.

Barclay Meador, Adv. M'gr.

The Natural Body Brace Co., of Salina, Kan., is managed by Mr. Howard C. Rash, well known to the brotherhood in Kansas, and elsewhere to some extent. To those who know Brother Rash no word commending him and his company need be spoken. To all others the assurance is given that the company is reliable and trustworthy.

For several weeks we have been running an advertisement of the Business and Shorthand department of Christian University, Canton, Mo. The particular department in question is under the supervision of J. J. Weber, who believes in up-to-date methods and is seeking to get the attention of young people who need such training as he and his associates can give.

Many of the leading newspapers are publishing a series of advertisements having four criss-cross lines across the face, just as if some one had made note of a good thing and had marked it for ordering. These advertisements are the announcement of Farwell & Rhines, Watertown, N. Y., makers of "Gluten Grits" and "Barley Crystals," for breakfast; "Pansy Flour," for biscuit, cake and pastry; "Gluten Flour," for dyspeptics; "Special Diabetic Flour" and "K. C. Whole Wheat Flour." These goods are known as the "Criss-Cross Cereals," the criss-cross lines on the face of their labels being part of their trade-mark.

Many of our subscribers and readers ought to make use of our subscribers' want column. Some are doing so. There are any number of wants existing among our people, here and there, which could be supplied through this column. Instances might be cited of wants being made known through this column and thereby supplied. For instance, one brother found ready sale for a stereopticon. In this issue Bro. J. C. Frank, of Union, Neb., who desires to locate in a town where there is one of our churches, makes this want known. He might write thousands of letters and not reach as many points as by this single advertisement. It is worth trying.

To The Queen.

Revered, beloved, O you that hold
A nobler office upon earth
Than arms, or power of brain, or birth
Could give to warrior-kings of old;

Victoria,—since your royal grace
To one of less desert allows
This laurel greener from the brows
Of him that uttered nothing base;

And since your greatness and the cares
That yoke with empire leave you time
To make demands of modern rhyme,
If aught of ancient worth be there;

. . . . . May you rule us long
And leave us rulers of your blood
As noble till the latest day!
May children of our children say,
She wrought her people lasting good.

Her court was pure, her life serene;
God gave her peace; her land reposed;
A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife and Queen.

—From Tennyson's Ode to the Queen in recognition of his appointment as Poet-Laureate, 1851.

Current Events.

Beginning of the New Reign. England has witnessed scenes during the past week which call to mind the pageantry of mediævalism and which remind us that there is no nation on earth which, in such a striking degree, unites progressiveness in the application of the principles of free government and conservatism in the maintenance of ancient ceremonies. The morning after the Queen's death, the accession of King Edward VII was proclaimed in various quarters of London by quaintly attired heralds. On the same day the King took the oath to govern according to the ancient laws and customs of the realm, and following this the privy council and various high officials of the government took their oaths of allegiance to the King. In the afternoon of the same day Parliament assembled in special session, and took the oath of allegiance. The members of the Cabinet placed their resignations in the hands of the King, as a matter of form, but they were not accepted. The machinery of government goes on without a break. The presence of Emperor William at Osborne House and in London during these trying days has been much appreciated by the English people. On his birthday, which occurred two or three days after the Queen's death, he was made a Field Marshal of the British army and was presented with the Order of the Garter, two honors which it is said the Queen had intended to confer upon him at this time. Memorial services in memory of the late Queen were held all over England last Sunday and the Archbishop of Canterbury preached a commemorative sermon in St. Paul's Cathedral. The date of the funeral has been set for February 2 at Windsor, where the body of Victoria will be interred beside that of her husband in the splendid mausoleum which she erected in his memory forty years ago.

The New King. The new King has had long experience in managing court functions and in administering the rites of royal hospitality, but has never been conspicuous for his interest in the more serious affairs of state. It is not known to what extent he will attempt to direct the course of his ministry. As Prince of Wales he has long been popular among most classes of Englishmen, but they have perhaps seldom taken him seriously. In spite of his fifty-nine years, he has been thought of rather as a youth, a thoroughly good fellow, though a bit wild at times, but then—"boys will be boys." It is a fact not to be concealed that in the transfer of the British crown from Victoria to Albert Edward, there is a loss of dignity of character and pure morality which gives the public a shock in addition to the universal grief at the death of the great and good queen. It would, perhaps, be unfortunate for any man of average morals to find his life not only illumined with the white light of publicity, but put in a position where it must inevitably be compared with a life so noble and admirable as that of the late queen. There are few who have any desire to call up at this time the scandals which have circulated in regard to him who was the Prince of Wales; certainly we have no such desire. But it must be frankly said that the present incumbent of the British throne sets no such example of private virtue and domestic serenity as the late sovereign gave to her people.

Temperance Legislation. Events of the last few weeks have given considerable encouragement to all good citizens who, while not believing that men can be made moral by law, believe that the laws ought to make it as easy as possible for men to do right. The following significant victories for temperance are cited by Wilbur F. Crafts, superintendent of the Reform Bureau at Washington: (1) In his message on December 3, President McKinley recommended the ratification of the treaty of 1899 to protect native races of Africa against intoxicants, and the extension of such protection to all civilized peoples, with special attention to the western Pacific. (2) On December 4, the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, urged by the Reform Bureau, the W. C. T. U. and the Anti-saloon League, voted to report the above treaty of 1899. (3) On December 6 the House of Representatives adopted the Bowersock anti-canteen amendment by a three-fourths vote. (4) On December 14 the Senate ratified the treaty of 1899. (5) On January 1, the Philippine Commission adopted a policy which will prevent the sale of intoxicants to the natives in the licensed saloons. This limitation is good as far as it goes, but should be extended much further. (6) On January 4 the Senate in the Lodge Resolution declared for further laws and treaties to protect all uncivilized races against intoxicants and opium, the resolution being in accordance with the recommendation of the President's message. (7) On January 9 the Senate refused to allow even beer to be sold in canteens and virtually killed the army canteen by a two-thirds vote—although the army bill and its amendment have not yet been passed by the Senate. Of the reform bills which are now pressing for enactment, the most immediate and important is the Gillett Bill for the exclusion of intoxicants and fire-arms from the natives of the New Hebrides and other islands not in the possession or under the protectorate of any civilized power. The Senate's defeat of the army bill amendment abolishing saloons in the Philippines is a set-back but no sign of the permanent failure of the measure.

Death of Verdi. Guiseppe Verdi, the greatest of Italian operatic composers, died on Sunday, Jan. 27. As Wagner stood at the head of German opera in the nineteenth century, so Verdi, as the composer of Il Trovatore, Traviata, Rigolletto and Aida, was the acknowledged master in Italian opera. Born in deep poverty at an obscure village in 1813, and devoting himself to music from his earliest youth, he amassed a fortune estimated at $3,000,000 as the reward of his musical genius. Aida, though far less known in this country than some of his other works, was the most profitable of all his compositions, and it is said that his share of the royalties for its production amounted to $800,000. This same opera is noteworthy as indicating the open-mindedness and impressionableness of the great composer. Wagner had come to his prime after Verdi's earlier operas were written and had introduced new principles of composition, and especailly of orchestration, strikingly at variance with the older models. In this work Verdi, who had already reached the very pinnacle of fame and might have been expected to maintain his style unchanged to the end, was notably influenced by the Wagnerian method. He was active to the end, in spite of his eighty-seven years, and left an opera unfinished at the time of his death.

The Whipping Post. Shall the whipping post be restored as a substitute for short-term imprisonment in punishment of minor offenses? The question is suggested by a bill introduced in the Indiana legislature for the establishment of a whipping post in every county-seat in the state. The bill as introduced provides that any male resident of the state who is convicted of striking a woman or girl, shall receive not less than fifteen and not more than fifty lashes with the raw-hide on his bare back. Petit larceny is to be punished by from five to fifty lashes. Tramps are to receive from ten to fifty. A man who deserts his family shall receive not less than thirty and not more than seventy-five. A similar penalty is provided for repeated intoxication. It is specifically provided that only male offenders are to be punished at the whipping post. It may, parhaps, be the intention of the author of this bill to suggest the rehabilitation of the ducking stool for women. Of course the bill will not be passed and of course we all admit that theoretically it is quite wrong. The whipping post is a thing of the past and, like flogging in the navy, it will probably never be introduced again. The tendency is against corporal punishment either for juvenile delinquents or for genuine criminals, but it is hard to escape the conviction that there are some kinds of misdemeanors and some kinds of miscreants that could be more appropriately and effectively punished by the raw-hide than by thirty days of confinement in a comfortable jail. When a man does a thing which is mean as well as criminal, our unregenerate human nature cannot help wanting to see him thrashed. Very often, indeed, he is thrashed by private zeal and muscle, but that constitutes a reprehensible disturbance of the peace, which is itself a second misdemeanor. It would relieve the minds of a good many men if there were some legal method of getting the thing done. It would, of course, be quite opposed to the principles of modern scientific criminology, but it would have its good points just the same. It may not be generally known that the whipping post is still in occasional use in three or four towns in Delaware.

The Dispensary System. The dispensary system as practiced in South Carolina is one of several methods of regulating the liquor traffic, more or less closely allied to the Norwegian and Gotenburg methods. It cannot be claimed that any of these methods is completely satisfactory, but there are some facts in connection with their operation which are worthy of notice. For ourselves, as our readers well know, we consider that the only proper way of dealing with the saloon is to kill it. Without considering them as an argument one way or the other, we give the following facts which are stated in the Columbia (Mo.) Herald by a Presbyterian minister of Charlotte, S. C. The dispensary has been in operation in that town three and one-half years and hundreds who at first opposed it now warmly advocate it in preference to the licensed saloon. Practically the only opposition to it now comes from the saloon-keepers and those who have a financial interest in the sale of liquor. The amount of liquor consumed has been reduced because it is not sold to drunkards or minors and cannot be drunk upon the premises. It closes at sundown, opens at sunrise and is believed to be really closed on Sunday. In consequence, crime is greatly reduced. The mayor declares that the number of arrests is less than half what it formerly was and the criminal court which used to be overworked and still had not time to try all its cases, now frequently adjourns for lack of the grist to grind. There is an especially marked diminution in the number of "drunk and disorderly" cases. Real estate men say that there is more demand for houses and that rents are more promptly paid. Every business in town, except the saloon business, has improved, for the money which formerly went to the owners of the saloons and to the distillers now passes through the channels of legitimate trade. At the same time the public revenue received from the dispensary has increased three-fold over the amount formerly received for licenses. The moral condition and general orderliness of the town cannot be measured by statistics, but it is said that there is an obvious improvement. These facts seem to indicate that the dispensary is a better means of disposing of liquor than the saloon. But after all it would be better to deal with the question nearer its source by putting the makers of the stuff out of business. The tendency is in that direction. Long ago we used to deal with the drunkard as the only criminal and let the saloon-keeper do as he pleased. Now we are learning to deal with the saloon-keeper. Soon, let us hope, we shall learn to begin at the very beginning and put a quietus on the distiller and the brewer.

The Indian Rising Alarmed at the prospect of a final division of their tribal reservation into individual holdings, the so-called Snake band of the Creek Nation, led by a brave called Crazy Snake, has been engaged in a protest, the method of which is of the war-path type. The first grievance seems to have been against those Indians who had accepted their individual allotments and had leased their farms to whites. Like a band of Whitecaps, they went about their country administering punishment to such and threatening the white lessees. Attempts to suppress them created fiercer opposition, and many Choctaws joined in. Though there was little disposition to attack whites, it was reasonably feared that, angered by the attempts to arrest them, they would start on a genuine war-path. Troops were called out and preparations were made to guard against a possible raid along the border of Oklahoma. As the result of a brilliant dash into the Indian camp, Crazy Snake, the most zealous leader, was captured by the United States marshal, and he, with several of the other leaders, is now in custody in Henrietta, I. T. It is believed that the disturbance is practically at an end, and the allotment of the land to the Indians in severalty will continue.

An Agricultural Subsidy. The Ship Subsidy Bill has resumed its place as unfinished business on the Senate calendar and will be debated until it is passed or until it becomes apparent that it cannot pass at the present session. As we have stated before, the plan advocated by the authors of this bill seems to us to involve an unwise and unfair discrimination in favor of a single industry. The $180,000,000 which would go to the owners of the American built vessels within twenty years would come from the pockets of people who are not directly interested in the building or owning of ships, and it does not appear that the indirect advantage would be sufficient compensation. At a convention of ship-owners and ship-builders in Philadelphia in 1895, Mr. Cramp, the most prominent of all the ship-builders, proclaimed it a grave error to ask for a bounty for shipping without a similar bounty on exported agricultural products. And the emphasis, too, should be placed on agriculture. "Instead of tacking agriculture on to shipping," said Mr. Cramp, "we should tack shipping on to agriculture." It should be borne in mind that the price at which American agricultural products can be sold abroad goes far toward determining the price which the same products will bring in this country. For example, if American wheat can be sold in Liverpool for 80 cents a bushel, and ocean freight is 10 cents a bushel, then wheat will not sell for less than 70 cents in New York. If, by a removal of competition or otherwise, the freight charge is raised to 15 cents, the price of wheat in New York will drop to 65 cents. The American farmer, therefore, has an immense interest at stake in any plan which threatens an interruption of natural competition and a consequent possible rise in ocean freight rates, as affecting the price not only of the products which he may export, but also of those which he sells in the home market. Similarly, the granting of a subsidy upon exported products would have the same effect upon the price of the unexported residue as a diminution of ocean freight rates. If the American producer is to be given a fair chance, therefore, there ought to be no subsidy for the owners of American built ships, unless there is a corresponding subsidy for the owners of exported American products. To arrange such a subsidy equitably so that farmers and manufacturers alike would be protected from the evil effects of an increased freight rate, would be a matter so difficult as to be virtuallly impracticable. The safest and fairest method is to keep clear of the subsidy business entirely.

Friars in the Philippines. The report of the Philippine Commission, which was forwarded a few days ago by the Secretary of War to the President and by him to the Senate, contains a very full statement of the present condition of affairs in the Philippine Islands. The work of pacification is reported to be proceeding satisfactorily. Three thousand insurgents have recently surrendered, and the oath of allegiance has been taken by 10,000 formerly disaffected persons. The Commission has made extensive inquiry into charges made against the friars. Immorality and gross licentiousness is found to have been so common among them that it cannot be said to be the exception. The natives are used to that, however, and the chief source of the unpopularity of the friars was the fact that in most of the parishes they were the sole representatives of the government and, in the mind of the natives, stood for all manner of Spanish tyranny and oppression. The Commission, while recognizing that the question is one of ecclesiastical policy, expresses a strong hope that the Catholic authorities will not send back the friars. The report outlines a possible method of dealing with the question of church property in the Philippines. The three religious orders—Dominicans, Franciscans and Augustinians—own an immense amount of property, most of which has been nominally transferred to an agent to manage. It is believed that they would gladly sell it. The insular government might purchase it and arrange to sell it on easy payments to the present tenants, very much as the Russian serfs repaid the government for the land which was given to them at the time of their liberation. In regard to religious teaching in the schools, it is set down as settled that church and state must be kept separate and that religious teaching, therefore, cannot be incorporated in the public school system. It is suggested that every religious denomination shall be accorded the right of sending instructors to the public schools a certain number of times a week, at such times as shall not interfere with other instruction, to teach religion to those children whose parents desire it. This would be a fair and proper method and if the Catholics had advantage by it, it would only be because they were more zealous in sending teachers and because the bulk of the population is at present Catholic.

The Disciples of Christ in the Twentieth Century.

Following the line of what we conceive to be our normal development, which we have been pursuing in several articles, we feel safe in forecasting a marked growth in liberality during the present century—liberality both in the primary and secondary meanings of the word; that is, in liberality of thought, largeness of mind, catholicity, impartiality, and in liberality of donations or gifts for the public good. Let us deal with these two meanings in the order mentioned.

It seems necessary, in the first place, to discard the use of the terms liberal and liberalism which have come into vogue in certain religious bodies which assume for themselves a monopoly of liberality. It is scarcely necessary for us to say that we have no sympathy with that false liberalism which rejects any part of the gospel of Christ or which identifies illiberalism with fidelity to that revelation of God in Christ whereof we have the literary record in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. This is not catholicity nor liberality; it is either unbelief or religious indifference. Some of those who pride themselves on their liberalism manifest a very illiberal spirit in discussing the great fundamental truths and facts of Christianity. We do well to be on our guard against that spurious type of liberality, so called, which eliminates the supernatural from the Bible and Christianity and in doing so forfeits the power which alone qualifies the church for doing the great work which has been committed to it.

But surely there is a Christian liberality, that is, a liberality within Christ, and in perfect harmony with His teaching, which we would do well to cultivate. There is a breadth about the spirit of our Master, a far-reaching inclusiveness in his love and sympathy and divine magnanimity in bearing with human weaknesses, when the central purpose and desire of the heart are sound, which afford ample room for progress on the part of the church universal.

> "There's a wideness in God's mercy
> Like the wideness of the sea;
> There's a kindness in his justice
> Which is more than liberty."

The church has not yet reached that wideness of mercy and that catholicity of teaching represented in Christ. This reformation, in discarding all human tests of fellowship and in refusing to bind men where God has left them free, making Christ Himself the object of faith, and obedience to Him alone the condition of fellowship, has made a long stride in returning to that catholicity of teaching which marked both Christ and His apostles, and which prevailed in the early church. But we have not always been true to this high standard which we have erected for ourselves, either in spirit or in practice. This is not because the standard is too high, but because we are human and the standard is divine. But we are growing in that direction. This is an indisputable and a most encouraging fact. We are coming to have a higher appreciation of the Christian character of those not affiliated with us in our reformatory work, and of the value of their service to the cause of our common Christianity. Many of us, however, have yet to grow in the spirit of Christian liberality and of true catholicity until we can realize the perfect consistency between the utmost fidelity to the truth as God has given us to see it, and the most generous appreciation of the character and work of other religious bodies which also are seeking to do the will of God as they understand it. All progress in this direction is progress toward that Christian union for which we are pleading. Christian unity can never come without a full and generous recognition of the Christian spirit, character and work of all those who acknowledge Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord, and who are sincerely seeking to extend His reign over all the earth. We feel sure that the present century will witness this advance in the direction of Christian union with not a whit less of loyalty to the principles for which we are contending, but on the other hand with a great deal more consistency between our practice and our plea. Nor shall we insist less persistently than now on that divine basis of unity which the New Testament offers. In a word, we shall come to a clearer apprehension than some of us at least have attained of our relation as reformers, seeking to return to Christ, to other Christians who are working along other lines of their historical development, and in their own way are also seeking to advance the kingdom of God. This relation will be seen to be that of allies, not foes—allies who in the coming time are to understand each other better and to work together more harmoniously for the kingdom of their common Lord and Master.

That other meaning of Christian liberality, to which we have referred, must also be realized in our Christian growth if we are to attain to the position and power which is within our reach during the century upon which we have entered. We must come to a better understanding of our responsibility to God for the proper use of the means he has committed to our hands as his stewards. We believe there is a connection, very close and vital, between the liberality of which we have been speaking and this liberality in material things. Broadness of mind and catholicity of spirit are favorable to largeness of giving and liberality in the use of our means. We have a right to expect that, along with an increasing knowledge of the Scriptures and a deepening spiritual life, there shall come a higher sense of our obligation to consecrate our earthly substance to the well-being of our fellowmen, and especially to the advancement of the kingdom of God on earth. We are witnessing this growth in liberality at the present time. It is going on before our eyes. But there are many, very many, who have not yet caught the contagion of generous giving, and who are withholding their surplus wealth from the Lord's use. When those of us who are committed to the work of restoring primitive Christianity come to a clearer apprehension of what this involves in the way of liberal giving, our colleges shall not plead in vain for endowment, our missionary treasuries will not be empty, while the workers in the field go unpaid for their services and many ripe fields are going to waste for lack of reapers. Neither will our benevolent enterprises languish for the lack of generous support, while our aged poor, while widows and orphans and our disabled preachers, are uncared for. Perhaps no one thing would do more to convince the world of the sincerity and value of our plea than the practice of that large-hearted, generous, Christian liberality in the use of our means which Christ so manifestly teaches and which His life so fully illustrates. We can never accomplish the work to which we have been called without a great growth in the grace of Christian giving. We have men of wealth among us who need to lay this matter on their hearts. If "to die rich is to die disgraced," as Mr. Carnegie teaches, it is time our men of wealth were beginning to administer their means for the public good. We believe all who are truly Christian will do so, for this is in the line of true Christian growth, and those who are Christ's will not turn back from following him because of his teaching concerning the right use of wealth.

In an editorial in the Outlook on "The Abolition of the Canteen," meaning the army saloon, that able paper, strangely enough, as it seems to us, regards this action as unwise and not in the interest of morality and good order in the army. The editor admits that "it is no reply to say that the abolition of the canteen will lead to the establishment of worse places outside the camp. The possibility that worse places may be established without government sanction does not justify the establishment of a bad place with government sanction. We should not believe it right for the government to license regulated houses of ill-fame or opium dens within the camp in order to compete with unregulated houses of ill-fame and unregulated opium dens without the camp." This is good. But following these statements, the editor says, "We do not think that all use or all sale of alcoholic beverages is wrong. . . . All drunkenness is wrong; all drinking is not wrong; whether drinking is wrong or not depends upon the time, the place, the circumstances, the person." We submit that those who voted for the abolition of the army canteen were not required to believe that "all use or all sale of alcoholic beverages is wrong;" or even that "all drinking is wrong." They simply believed that on the whole the army canteen is a temptation for soldiers to drink and to spend their money for drink, and that the evils growing out of it are greater than any alleged good that may result from it. The position of the Outlook that this measure of Congress in abolishing the canteen "will tend to keep from enlistment men who resent being put under a bondage not necessary for the good of the force and who will be unwilling to enter a service which avowedly treats them as children unable to care for themselves," is to us most extraordinary. We have never heard yet of a good, moral young man being kept out of any town or county or state or out of the army because saloons were prohibited. We do not doubt the sincerity of the Outlook in its position on this question, but it seems to us strangely inconsistent with the known character and influence of the saloon in corrupting the young.

Minister Wu's speech on Confucianism and Christianity a few weeks ago has called forth many curious comments, but none more weird and truth-defying than that of the Western Watchman (Catholic). The Watchman's chief point is to show that, in the first place, Wu's claim of the superiority of Confucianism over Christianity is quite correct if by Christianity he means Protestantism; and, in the second place, that after all Confucianism and Protestantism are about the same thing. Among the points in which our Roman contemporary alleges that Confucianism and Protestantism agree are the following: Both hold the immortality of the soul as a "mere pious speculation." Neither believes in future punishments. Both regard "sin as a physical disorder, no more to be deplored than bodily ills or bad weather." Both admire the character of Jesus, but neither believes in all his teaching. Neither believes in miracles. Neither believes in spirits, good or bad. To sum the whole matter up, "the only difference between good Confucians and good Protestants is one of expediency; the former holding that the sending of missionaries to China is absurd and wasteful, while the latter maintain that it is one way of meriting a heavenly reward." While it would be doing great injustice to the Catholic Church and the Catholic hierarchy to saddle upon them the responsibility for all the absurd falsehoods uttered by the Western Watchman on this and other subjects, we nevertheless call attention to this as a particularly flagrant example of Catholic misrepresentation of Protestant belief. Because we do not believe in a purgatory, they say we do not believe in future punishment. Because we do not believe in the fradulent cures worked by their bogus relics, they say we do not believe in miracles. Because we do not pray to the saints, they say we do not believe in spirits. There is only one true statement about Protestantism in the whole article and that is this: Minister Wu "does not believe in making a hell on earth in order to have a heaven hereafter; neither do Protestants." It is to be inferred then that Catholics do believe in making a hell on earth in order to have a heaven hereafter. Well, there are some countries in which they are showing great zeal in carrying out the first part of this programme at least.

Hour of Prayer.

An Upward Look.*

TEXT:—I will lift up mine eyes unto the mountains:
From whence shall my help come?
My help cometh from Jehovah,
Who made heaven and earth.
Psalm 121:1, 2.

This is the second of the fifteen Psalms (CXX-CXXXIV) called Songs of Ascent or, in the old version, Songs of Degrees. They were pilgrim songs sung by the Jews on their way up to Jerusalem to attend the national feasts. Their very act of going to Jerusalem to worship instead of bowing down to the idols of other nations was a declaration in a most tangible form of their faith in Jehovah and of the fact that they were looking to him for aid and not to the heathen idols. These pilgrim songs, so full of expressions of trust in Jehovah, were therefore in harmony with the occasion which called them forth.

Source of Help.

It is of the first importance that every one should have a clear conviction as to where his help is to come from in those supreme moments of trial and of sorrow when no human hand can help us. Many trust in uncertain riches, or in some arm of flesh, until taught by sad experience that there is no help in them. This Psalmist of the olden time had tested and tried the various sources of help and his conviction was very clear.

"My help cometh from Jehovah
Who made heaven and earth."

We have a much fuller revelation of God's gracious purposes and many more reasons for trusting him now than any of the singers of Israel of those times could possibly possess. There are millions of believers on the earth to-day whose Christian experience has taught them that help cometh from Jehovah and that all other sources of strength and consolation fail in the moment of supreme need. It is a great lesson of life when one learns to seek counsel and strength and comfort from God and to test every act of his life by the divine will.

Security of Those Who Trust in Jehovah.

"They that trust in Jehovah
Are as Mount Zion, which cannot be moved but abideth forever.
As the mountains are round about Jerusalem,
So Jehovah is round about his people,
From this time forth and forever more."
(Psalm 125:1,2.)

How natural that these pilgrim Jews should be thinking of Mount Zion on their way thither and of the mountains round about it. They regarded Jerusalem as impregnable because of its natural defenses and because Jehovah was in it. What these mountains were round about Jerusalem, that Jehovah was round about his people, a sure defense in every time of need. This statement can be confirmed by the vast stretch of history intervening between the time when it was uttered and the present time. The man who has made God his defense who has so lived and wrought the will of God as to feel that he is working with God, has a consciousness of security which is impossible to those whose own consciences condemn them. There is often, of course, a false security against which we must be on our guard. Only those who do the will of God have a right to trust in Him and enjoy a sense of security from danger.

What the Upward Look Secures.

"Jehovah is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?
Jehovah is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?" (Psalm 27:1.)

Light is what men are seeking on all questions which relate to human welfare. Some seek it in one direction and some in another. Blessed is the man who learns to look upward for the true light which alone can banish the darkness from human life. Salvation, too, is that which all men desire and which all men need. True, all men do not realize their need of salvation from sin, but this is the supreme need of men. This salvation can be found only in Jehovah. Whom shall a man fear who possesses light and salvation from God? The believer receives not only light and salvation from Jehovah, but strength for all the conflicts of life, for he can exclaim with the Psalmist "Jehovah is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?" The man who fears God need fear no other being in the universe. Troubles will come but—

"In the day of trouble he shall keep me secretly in his pavilion:
In the covert of his tabernacle shall he hide me." (Psalm 27:5.)

This promise has sustained many a believer in the hour of trial and conflict when the enemies of righteousness were arrayed against him.

A Present Help.

It is said of Luther that in times of great personal danger when his life was in peril because of the principles he advocated, he used to read aloud to his wife the forty-sixth Psalm:

"God is our refuge and strength,
A very present help in trouble.
Therefore will we not fear, though the earth do change,
And though the mountains be moved in the heart of the seas;
Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled,
Though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."

What a man wants in time of trouble is "a very present help." He wants to feel that in the very midst of his danger there is an invisible arm that shields him, an invisible God who is at once his refuge and strength. No man can carry on any great religious or moral reform without this confidence in Jehovah as an immediate refuge and an immediate source of wisdom and strength on whom we can rely at any time for guidance and protection. God is not only a source of refuge but of joy and gladness as well, for it is from Him that there floweth that river "the streams whereof make glad the city of God" (Psalm 46:4). All our springs of true joy and of unfading pleasure have their source in God. Sooner or later all others fail us.

Sufficiency in Christ.

The apostle Paul, who identifies the Christ of the New Testament with the Jehovah of the Old Testament, and who had varied experience both in Judaism and in Christianity, said in the later period of his life when he was a prisoner in Rome for the cause of Christ, "I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4:13). He could endure want or abundance. He could rejoice in imprisonment or in personal freedom. He could suffer shipwrecks, stripes, persecution from his own brethren, desertion by his friends and even death itself. He could do all things through Christ who strengthened him. The true upward look, therefore, that gives strength and security, light and salvation, gladness and efficiency in doing and suffering God's will, is the look of faith in Christ which accepts him as Savior and Redeemer and submits to him in all things. This upward look is the look of faith that sees God in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself and working out the world's redemption. May nothing ever obscure our vision of God in Christ, the source of all strength, of all joy and of all blessings.

Prayer.

Almighty God, we thank Thee for faith, the soul's vision, by which we may see Thee, who art invisible to the eye of sense and by which we may walk with Thee and receive strength from Thee and protection in life's duties and dangers. May we so fully commit our lives to Thee in the doing of Thy will that we may be indifferent as to what man can do unto us. Give us, we beseech Thee, that serene courage that will enable us to follow Thee according to the light which Thou hast given us, regardless of all consequences to ourselves, and wilt Thou be our present help in every time of danger, our joy in every time of sorrow, our strength in every time of weakness and our everlasting reward through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

*Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Feb. 6.

Editor's Easy Chair.

It is said of Henry Ward Beecher that at the close of a long harangue in his prayer-meeting one night by a woman, when the patience of the congregation had been worn out, he arose and quietly added, "Nevertheless, brethren, I believe in the right of women to speak in the church," and proceeded with the meeting. So we feel disposed to say, in view of Mrs. Nation's offensive operations against the saloons in Kansas by the use of the hatchet, we nevertheless believe in the mission of women in bringing about moral and social reforms. We are compelled to say, however, that the former crusade, which probably led to the organization of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, in which prayer was used rather than the hatchet, was more in harmony with what we conceive to be woman's character and mission than the method adopted by Mrs. Nation. We know that God honors prayer. There is some doubt in the minds of many good people about whether He will honor a hatchet used for the destruction of property even when that property is being unlawfully used. The end which Mrs. Nation has in view is one which commands the sympathy of all who believe that the saloon is a device of the devil for destroying the young and who sympathize with the supremacy of law and order. The method she employs will be disapproved by many good people because they believe in a supremacy of law and do not believe in doing evil that good may come.

We are reminded that while

"John Brown's body lies moldering in the ground
His soul goes marching on."

Very true! But let it be remembered that it is his soul that goes marching on and not his method. His method perished with his body and likewise "lies moldering in the ground," except in sporadic cases where men rise up and violate the law in order to punish law-breakers. John Brown's raid doubtless served to call attention to the slavery evil and to excite interest in it. Mrs. Nation's heroism in facing the law-breakers of Kansas with her hatchet may result in good in arousing the people of that state and of the nation to the lawlessness of the liquor traffic and in leading them to adopt some measures toward enforcing the law and enacting laws which will be more effective in suppressing the evil. If this shall prove to be the case, Mrs. Nation's soul will go marching on in the temperance ranks, but her method will not commend itself to a large number of men and women who are anti-saloon workers.

The anti-slavery spirit and the anti-saloon spirit are bound to go marching on, because slavery and the saloon are enemies of God and man. And whatsoever is opposed to God and man is bound to be ultimately put out of the way. The anti-slavery spirit represented by John Brown's soul has a good deal of marching to do yet before every species of slavery has been banished from the earth. Indeed the liquor traffic itself is one of the worst tyrants that ever enslaved humanity. It not only enslaves its victims who drink at its bars, but it enslaves law-makers and executors of the law and courts and sometimes—with shame may it be said—it enslaves the pulpit. Is it any wonder that women, who especially have felt the sting and the shame, the burden and the sorrow of this great overshadowing curse, and who are deprived of the ballot, should sometimes resort to measures of violence to express their opposition to it? Let us, therefore, mingle pity with our censure, if we must censure such methods as Mrs. Nation has adopted.

Above all, in our censuring let us not fail to mete out a large measure to the men of Kansas and especially to those in official position who have it in their power to execute the law and close these dens of iniquity, and who do not do it. The spirit of chivalry which in all ages is recognized to be the duty of man to protect womanhood and the helpless and defenseless ones, ought to inspire the voters of America to rise up in the strength of their manhood against the saloon. If they are in earnest about it, they can elect men who will execute the laws. If the laws are not adequate, as they are not in most of the states, they can elect men who will enact the necessary laws for the suppression of the evil. What is most needed, however, in every state and in every city and almost in every town and family is the enforcement of laws which are already on the statute book against the evils of the liquor traffic. It is this spirit of indifference to the lawlessness of the saloons, and their boldness in defying courts and legislatures, which ought to arouse our supreme concern and to call forth our indignant censure rather than the destruction by unlawful methods of the plate glass and furnishings and contents of a few of these unlawful saloons.

Questions and Answers.

A recent incident has raised this question: Is it within the limits of Christian liberty to observe the Lord's Supper on other than the Lord's day? I do not affirm or deny; I am seeking for truth, and will gladly welcome any light you may throw upon the question. A Learner.

This is the spirit in which all such questions should be approached. The question asked is not one that has received as much attention among us as some other phases of the communion problem. We shall seek to answer it solely in the light of the New Testament, and the nature of the institution itself. Let us say, first of all, that we believe the custom, well established among us, of observing the Lord's Supper on each first day of the week has the sanction of the early church after it had settled down to its normal life, and that there is a fitness in associating this institution with the day observed in memory of Christ's resurrection, the Lord's day. We take it that on this point we are all agreed. No change in our regular order of worship is contemplated in the question. What our querist then wishes to know is our opinion as to whether it is admissible, on occasions of a specially important nature, to celebrate the Lord's death on any other day of the week than the Lord's day. We think it is, and do not believe there is anything in the New Testament or in the nature of the institution to prohibit its observance under any conditions and at any time when, in the judgment of the church or of the brethren interested, its observance would be appropriate. For instance, in the case of sick persons who desire the privilege of partaking of the emblems in memory of Christ and who have no assurance of living until another Lord's day, we should have no scruples in administering the institution to them. If our national conventions did not hold over Lord's day it would be a very appropriate thing, in our judgment, and a source of spiritual profit to set apart an hour when brethren might sit together at the Lord's table and enjoy fellowship with one another and the risen Lord. Our reasons for this view we can only briefly mention:

1. The Lord's Supper was instituted and was first observed on Thursday evening. This would hardly have been the case if our Lord had intended that the institution should never be observed except on the first day of the week. He would not himself have set the example by instituting it and having it observed on Thursday.

2. It is the almost universal testimony of Bible scholars and commentators that the church at Jerusalem observed the breaking of bread in the Eucharist or Lord's Supper daily. It is not at all in harmony with our generally accepted view of apostolic enduement and authority that they would lend their sanction to a practice that was not in harmony with Christ's will and purpose. They undoubtedly understood the nature and purpose of the institution and no doubt observed it in its true spirit. It is not argued here, of course, that this example makes it obligatory upon us to observe the institution daily, as it undoubtedly became the custom later on, even within the apostolic age, to observe the supper on the Lord's day in connection with the Lord's day meeting. The point is, that the apostles would not transcend the limits of Christian liberty.

3. In Acts 20:7, the passage so often cited, and properly so, to show that it was the custom of the churches at that time to meet on the first day of the week for the purpose of breaking bread, there is no proof that the supper was not observed occasionally on some other day of the week. Indeed it is tolerably clear that on this very occasion, where Paul preached until midnight, the supper was observed early on Monday morning. The only way to avoid this conclusion is to suppose that they met on Saturday evening, counting Sunday to begin with sundown, and observed the supper early Sunday morning and that Paul left on his journey on the Lord's day. There is no reason for resorting to this improbable view of the case except to avoid the conclusion that the breaking of bread took place on Monday instead of the Lord's day. We cannot imagine it would make the slightest difference with Paul whether the hour of midnight had passed or not when the time came to observe this institution. To conclude otherwise would be to give a legalistic interpretation to the Lord's Supper, which the New Testament does not sanction. Mosheim, writing of Christianity as it was in the second century, says: "In these times the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was celebrated for the most part on Sundays" (P. 49). It would seem from this that the observance of the Lord's Supper usually took place on the Lord's day, but was not limited to that day. The occasional observance on other than the first day of the week was a survival of the earlier custom of daily communion and not the beginning of the later dissociation of the observance from the day, which characterized Romanism.

In view of all these facts we feel justified in our conclusion that while the church is justified in the practice of weekly communion, and that on the Lord's day, it is no violation of New Testament teaching and it is in perfect harmony with the nature and spirit of the institution itself, when occasion seems to make it proper and useful, to observe it on some other day.

Tendencies to Denominational Assimilation

By LEONARD WOOLSEY BACON, D. D.

Assimilation, Not Union.

By assimilation I do not mean union or confederation. Likeness between sects does not imply combination nor even mutual attraction, and is even compatible with very vigorous mutual repulsion. The Unitarian and Universalist organizations are so near of kin that it is claimed that all Unitarians are Universalist and all Universalists are Unitarian; there is sympathy and fellowship between the two, but no union, nor immediate likelihood of union. Between the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Reformed Episcopal the resemblance is so close as to be a positive bar to any good relations. The most acrimonious schism in American history divided between two bodies that professed not only the same doctrinal standards and the same discipline, but the same corporate name. There is talk nowadays about church union and combination and federation; but just now I am writing on another subject.

The tendency to mutual assimilation is manifest in matters of government and administration, in measures and usages, and in doctrinal teachings.

Tendency to Home Rule.

There are three leading types of church organization in America, the Congregational, the Classical, and the Prelatic. But everywhere throughout American Christendom there is a tendency, in the actual working of every system, toward a practical congregationalism. In our nominally hierarchical sects, the Methodist and the Roman, the principle of home rule for the congregation, while not acknowledged, is very largely conceded. The governing power is absolute, but is exercised with tactful regard to the will of the governed. The bishop may appoint or remove at his discretion; but his judgment is found to coincide, with great regularity, with any very decided wish of the people concerned. It is well understood that the stability of hierarchical authority depends on a judicious caution in the use of it. The extent to which the "Americanizing" of the Roman Catholic Church has proceeded in this country is regarded with profound interest, and sometimes anxiety, by the Catholic countries of Europe. The various classical or synodical church systems of America (among which is to be included the Protestant Episcopal Church, for the government of this is episcopal only in name,) have frankly adopted the home-rule principle for their congregations, with certain limitations from the synodical authority.

Tendency to Centralization.

On the other hand, there is equally manifest progress in the congregationalist denominations (including, of course, the Baptists) toward centralization and synodical authority. Tradition and usage tend, among them, to grow into a common law quite as authoritative as written constitutions and canons. Humble committees and secretaries, without any purpose of usurpation, find themselves invested with the powers of a bureaucracy, and national councils, while sincerely disclaiming all authority, are liable to have authority thrust upon them at almost any time. Church representation on missionary boards seems an innocent improvement; but it only needs a lively controversy, a disputed election, and a committee on credentials, to reveal the fact that it has essentially established a synodical government.

Similar Forms of Worship.

In measures and usages there have formerly been strongly marked contrasts among different sects. The Episcopalians used to be tenacious, and (with increasing variations) are still tenacious, of the exclusive use of certain prescribed forms in public worship. The Puritans and Presbyterians were equally resolute in refusing all "human composures," and this, not as a mere matter of prejudice or preference, but as a solemn matter of principle—that such use was a sin against God, a constructive violation of the Second Commandment. When Watts' hymns came in, this principle went out, and the way was opened wide for liturgical worship; and, at first slowly and timidly, but with accelerating pace, these sects have been venturing into the way. The immense Methodist movement was characterized by spontaneous popular responses "to the giving of thanks," but the characteristic is fading out.

Revival Methods.

For one hundred and fifty years "revival methods" have been in favor in most of the Protestant churches of America, the leading feature of these methods being the "protracted meeting." The Episcopal and Roman Catholic denominations were distinguished by a dignified aloofness from such measures. To-day they are as deep in revival methods as any of us, only they call them "missions." But in this they are only "reverting to type;" for, as old Dr. Hewit, of Bridgeport, once asked on an interesting occasion, "What is Lent but a forty days' protracted meeting frozen up?" On the other hand, since the epoch made by Bushnell's Christian Nurture, all the churches have been steadily tending toward the adoption, under one name or another, of the method of preparing candidates for confirmation in a pastor's class of catechumens.

Equality in Education.

There was a time when the two most numerous sects of American Christendom, the Baptists and the Methodists, were distinguished by an open contempt for liberal education as a qualificatian for the ministry. On the other hand, the New England Congregationalists were the intellectual aristocracy of the American church, and monstrously proud of their learned clergy. At present, this distinction has ceased to exist. The Methodists and Baptists are coming to have a clergy equal in culture and learning to any, their colleges and universities rank with the foremost, and the erudition and ability of their theological magazines are matter of denominational pride. Meanwhile, especially outside of New England, this leveling up of the two great sects has been attended with a leveling down of the high standards of the other sect. One of the most notable examples of this mutual assimilation in methods is found in the employment, under the inflexible Quaker regimen, of salaried ministers while the use of meetings for worship, nearly after the ideal of the Quaker meeting, has become almost universal in other sects.

Approximation of Doctrines.

The mutual approach of the various sects in the matter of doctrine consists partly in a clear change of position on the old questions, and partly, and perhaps chiefly, in the fact that the old questions, on which the sects originally divided, have ceased to be discussed, being superseded by other questions. Who is debating nowadays those questions between old-school and new-school on which, sixty years ago, men used to wrangle on the street corners and on the barrel-heads of the country groceries, and which ripped the Presbyterian Church in twain? The points at issue are simply obsolete; and it is an exceptionally diligent and acute student of ecclesiastical history who can tell off-hand what they were.

Possibly in some far-away regions one may still hear the preacher, Arminian or Calvinist, pettifogging the same old questions of fixed fate and free will over which Toplady and Wesley waxed valiant in fight 125 years ago; but ordinarily no one can guess, from hearing the sermon, whether he is in a Calvinist church or a Methodist. The preachers are talking on other themes. How completely the issues have shifted between Anglican and Puritan in the progress of learning in the few years since Dr. Hatch's Bampton Lectures! There is no better text-book, in its department, for an up-to-date Congregationalist theological seminary than the treatise on "Christian Institutions" by Professor Allen, of the Episcopal Divinity School at Cambridge; and it would not be a bad book for Baptist students. We all owe an immense debt to our heretics for having helped pry up the ox-cart on which we have been transporting the ark, out of the deep ruts of ancient controversy. Old antagonists have found themselves shoulder to shoulder fighting against old allies; the new questions concerning God in creation, concerning the self-consciousness of Jesus, concerning the authority of Scripture, concerning the ethnic religions, having cut athwart the old dividing lines, making new parties in the old sects.

The Old Creeds.

There has not been much questioning of old symbols—although there is something of it, as the agitation in the Presbyterian Church and the revolution at Andover prove—but there has been what Dr. Munger calls "a transfer of emphasis." Dr. Gladden once read to his people some solemn paragraphs on the wages of sin, from "The Latest Word of Universalism," and added the remark, "Ah, brethren, you don't hear such things from orthodox pulpits nowadays!" From either side of this line, from either side of almost any line, each party is claiming that the opposite party is advancing in its direction; and both parties are generally right.

I do not forget that in two of the minor sects, the Unitarians and the Episcopalians, there are powerful tendencies to divergence and division. These are comparatively unmportant eddies in the current of contemporary church history. They draw attention to the general direction of the current.

What of It?

What is the prognosis suggested by such facts as I have cited? Are we tending toward general consolidation or "organic union" of sects? I do not so read the signs of the times. We have seen that very close approximation, and even identity of views and usages, instead of involving consolidation, may be even a hindrance to it—an occasion of repulsion. The fond dream of an organic Church Universal, with an ecumenical General Assembly or conference or standing committee instead of a Pope, seems to me as far away as ever, with no prospect of its ever coming nearer to realization. But the present fluidity of religious opinion and practice, and especially the universally and deeply prevailing consciousness of vast common aims, and arduous common duties, and an overwhelming common enemy, and of a paramount trust and love to a common Lord, must powerfully draw us all toward the mutual recognition of a common discipleship, under widely unlike conditions, and to that mutual love which is so far greater than confessional, or governmental or sacramental fellowship, and to the unity of the Spirit and the bond of peace. The tendency ought to be, will be, to a clearer recognition of the sinfulness of schism, the waste and shame and scandal of sectarian competitions. The confusion of opinions, sentiments and practices at the present day seems almost like a dance of atoms in chaos; but the Spirit of God is brooding over the face of the deep, and presently we shall hear the Word, and light and order shall come forth.

What Most Interests Me Now

By J. S. LAMAR

II.—The Passage of the Eternal into the Temporal.

The subject which I have concluded to discuss with some little fullness, in the few chapters which I have undertaken to prepare for the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, embraces much more than is indicated in the title of the present chapter. My contemplation includes, of course, not only the passage of the eternal into the temporal, but also, as its counterpart and consequent, the passage of the temporal into the eternal. This line of thought, when once entertained and patiently traced, becomes most prolific in interest, most strengthening to faith, and most assuring to hope.

That Christianity is divine in its origin and essence, is a proposition strongly supported by evidences with which we are all familiar. These are numerous and powerful, and they have so perfectly satisfied our own minds that we are apt to think that they are logically conclusive, i. e., conclusive when presented to the cold intellect alone. But that they are not is abundantly shown by the number of honest doubters that we encounter—earnest skeptics, who would be glad to believe but cannot. Indeed, I question whether highest truth can ever be indubitably brought home to the mere intellect. This would amount to a kind of intellectual compulsion—and compulsion of any sort is incongruous with the spirit and life of the Christian religion. Nor is it sufficient to approach the consideration of the evidences with interests centered, whether anxiously or hopefully, upon the future. This may lead to a sort of halting, questioning, uncertain half-faith —a hope or a fear or both that possibly, after all, Christianity may be true, and, upon the whole, it is better to accept it, and try to conform the life to it. But manifestly, in all this the self so predominates that the essential being of the man, his inmost heart, which alone can sympathize with the Divine heart and mind and character, is not truly enlisted.

And in the best and noblest of Christians, those who live and walk with God, who are at one with him, sympathizing with his heart and his purposes, and living in the very atmosphere of his love—even in these there may be at times an abatement of perfect conviction—a sort of residuum of uncertainty, that interferes with complete rest and undisturbed repose—a little remnant of doubt, hidden away in some nook or corner of the mind, which the world or the flesh or the devil may at any moment bring into the light. It may seldom appear, it may never be entertained, and still it may suggest the flitting thought: What if at last the whole thing turns out to be untrue! What if I have been building up my character upon a baseless delusion! What if the infidel is right, and death ends it all! Such momentary thoughts and suggestions of the wicked one must be disquieting to any Christian. To one who has passed his three-score years and ten they are distressing and intolerable. With him the case is urgent. He cannot afford to rest for a moment in a faith over which even the shadow of uncertainty may be thrown. He wants a faith, supported by logical argument and conclusion, to be sure, but by something much more than logic. He wants it to be an intuition of the soul—a deep sympathetic feeling, so that with his inner eyes he can see God in it—a faith which is known to be grounded in eternal verities and absolute certainties, and which, consequently, no skeptical caviling can excite, no criticism can agitate, and no discovery of science alarm or disturb; a faith, therefore, which brings to the soul perfect rest in perfect peace.

To such of my readers, of whatever age, as feel an earnest longing for this richest and best of all attainments, I hope to be somewhat helpful in these chapters, representing, as they will, the fruits of my most serious studies and my deepest experience. In writing for Christians, as I do, my special object is not, of course, to produce faith in the Divinity of the Christian Religion, for that they already have; nor is it, strictly speaking, to confirm their faith, as if it were weak and hesitating; it is rather to assist them, if I can, more completely to realize the truth believed—more deeply to feel it—more heartily to rejoice in it. Towards this end every one will desire more and more to advance, and none will more ardently desire this than those who are already among the best and truest and ripest in the Christian ranks.

Ordinarily we contemplate Christianity from this side; that is to say, we look back at it through the centuries—through the history of the church, through the writings and Acts of the Apostles, and the life and work of the Master; or we take our stand with him, and look forward over the same territory. This course was primarily necessary. It has led to rich results. In infinitely varying measure it has enlarged our conception, increased our knowledge, and supported and confirmed our faith. But now, holding fast to all that we have gained and all that we have got, let us hope for attainments still higher and richer by approaching the subject from the other side. For if the books of time have yielded such blessed fruits, what may we not expect when we reverently open and carefully read and consider the book of eternity.

Paul, the inspired of God, must be our guide and leader here. You must have noticed how fond the holy Apostle seems to have been of these eternal verities. His soul was so full of them that again and again it would run over in words of exultant delight. He speaks of the mystery or secret, hidden in God; of the eternal purpose of God in Christ, and the wonderful part that the church was to perform as the teacher of the heavenly hierarchies; and all this contemplated "before the world," "before the foundation of the world," "before times eternal" (2 Tim. 1:9; Titus 1:3; R. V.). The fact of this eternal secret, and what it was, was revealed and made known to him by the eternal Spirit who "searchest all things, yea, the deep things of God." Now if we had to pause here, we should have the testimony of one of the most competent, trustworthy and gifted witnesses, and this would be much; but we need not pause here. True, we have not in us the inspiring and revealing Spirit that enabled Paul to see the invisible things of God; we cannot go back before the creation of the world and look directly into the mind of God, and read there his eternal purpose, but we can see these things for ourselves, notwithstanding. In these last times a volume has been opened wide for us, of which in Paul's day barely the title-page was known—a volume written by God himself, and revealing the very things we most earnestly seek to know.

The Apostle himself speaks of this as being a source of highest certitude and even actual knowledge. He says: "For the invisible things of him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being perceived through the things that are made, even his everlasting power and divinity" (Rom. 1: 20). In this language the word divinity includes all the attributes of God—one only of which, his everlasting power, being singled out for express mention. If, therefore, we read the pages of this great volume by the light of the wonderful revelation made to the apostle, rather than by the feebler light of mere law, viewed as a blind and purposeless force, we may expect to see, and to see clearly, the greatest and most wonderful things—to perceive "through the things that are made," as through a telescope, the far-off glories contemplated by the Infinite Mind. We should see, not simply, perhaps not at all, the low evolution which men assume as the result of unaccountable law and inexplicable force, but the grander evolution of an eternal purpose; the unfoldings of an Infinite Mind; the footprints of the Infinite Being, moving ever onward toward a predetermined end; in short, the Eternal with all the fullness of his love and wisdom, his goodness and grace and power, passing into Time.

What Is Democracy?

By H. M. Brooks.

BROTHER EDITOR:—I was pleased to read the article on "The Growth of Democracy," from the pen of the Hon. Champ Clark whom I have known and admired for many years. Champ Clark is a scholar, thinker and full of the old-fashioned oratory and I always read with avidity everything that I find from his pen. And it is through no spirit of combativeness that I pen these remarks, but his article raises questions with which I have been wrestling for several years.

Having studied the question somewhat, I have come to the conclusion that there is no such thing as a pure democracy in existence. And when I say this I have no reference to the frailties, shortcomings and imperfections of men, for this is always granted. I am speaking of a system of government.

It will best serve my purpose to speak of the different forms of governments thus far developed by man. In the final test there are but two forms of government, viz., self government and representative government. Democracy is self government, while all other forms are representative, whether it be a Monarchy, an Oligarchy, an Aristocracy or a Republic in the last analysis it is Representative. Whether the people consent to be ruled by one man, by twenty men or by a hundred, it is representative. And a representative form of government can not in truth be called a democracy. The very etymology of the word forbids it. The word is from two Greek words, "demos," people; and "krateo," to rule. Hence rule by the people. The Standard dictionary defines the word democracy as, "a political system in which government is exercised directly by the people collectively, government by the people."

Now according to the foregoing definition there is no such thing in existence as a democracy. Nor is such a thing possible without the principle known as the Referendum. In this system Jefferson believed. This takes the veto power from the executive and places it with the people where it belongs. Under this system nothing can become law till it is referred to the people and ratified by the people. I notice two very grave mistakes in regard to government. One is to confound the words "democracy" and "republic" and the other is to take for granted that because a government is republican in form it is indestructible. The final historian who writes the history of governments will record the fact that all governments representative in form are failures. Man can no more govern himself by a representative than he can worship God by a representative or live a moral life by proxy.

There have been many republics but not a democracy among them all. Many of these republics have rivaled our own in wealth, literature and statesmanship. We might refer to Greece, Rome and Carthage as examples of the fact that republics will die. And if there be anything to hinder our own republic from going the way of all the republics of the past I would like for some one to tell me what it is.

I see nothing in our own government to hinder a condition in which we will have a nation with hovels and slaves on the one hand and castles and nobles on the other.

Tuscola, Ill.

[The foregoing advocacy of the Referendum expresses a thought which is in many men's minds. Without combating any essential argument which the writer made, the following suggestions may be offered: (1) In the article referred to Hon. Champ Clark used the word "democracy" in the sense of the spirit of freedom in governments of any form. This usage is sanctioned by custom, etymology to the contrary, notwithstanding. (2) If all governments are to be divided into two classes, the most important principle of classification is not the question as to whether the people make their own laws, but whether those who make the laws are responsible to the people. (3) Democratic government, in the strict sense, has been tried in ancient times, if indeed it is not older than representative government. The early Roman Republic, which, as the writer reminds us, is no more, was not a representative government but was government by the popular assembly of all the citizens who were within reach of Rome. The Communes in the Italian cities in the later middle ages were not representative. They too are gone. But the death of these governments no more shows that the Referendum is dangerous than the gone-ness of Rome shows that our Republic is doomed unless we get it.—EDITOR.]

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

In the eighth annual conference of the Foreign Mission Boards of the United States and Canada just held in this city, January 16-18, more than forty boards were represented. We all regretted the enforced absence of Bros. McLean and Rains, though by special request of the president the Foreign Christian Missionary Society was represented at the conference by the writer. Among the features of special interest were the reports of the Ecumenical Conference committees on general affairs, on comity and the executive committee. The whole trend of the discussion on "Comity" looked in the direction of fraternal co-operation and ultimately toward organic unity.

Dr. H. O. Dwight read an interesting paper before the conference from the view point of many years' experience in the land of the Turk on "The Mohammedan Missionary Problem." Robert E. Speer's paper on "The Science of Missions" was one of many excellent points and was ordered published by the conference. "The Home Problem of Foreign Missions," by Dr. Samuel B. Capen, should be placed in the hands of all pastors, elders and others in charge of the forces on the home field. President Capen's paper will help to solve this vexed problem, though it cannot be expected to accomplish all that may be desired in that direction. Rev. Chas. L. Rhoades presented a most excellent paper on "Missionary Education in the Sunday-school." Dr. Rhoades said one Sunday is not enough time in which to teach missions in the Sunday-school, but that the central idea of Christian missions should be impressed upon the children every week in the year.

The question of the relationship between missions and missionaries and governments brought out many points of interest; especially in relation to the matter of indemnity. The consensus of opinion seemed to be that the mission boards should exercise the most scrupulous care in the presentation of claims for damages sustained, because in China the best people—friends of the missions—would have to pay the indemnity and not those who perpetrated the crimes against men and property. It was also suggested that all means should be employed to impress upon the Chinese that the property they destroyed had been placed in their land by generous hearts for their own good and that the ones to suffer most after all are the Chinese themselves and not the mission boards that held the property.

Dr. T. S. Barbour's paper on "The Relation of Missions and Missionaries to the Religious Customs of the Peoples" was thought-provoking on a number of vital points. One great principle that the speaker insisted upon was that of absolute loyalty to Jesus Christ. He said, and truly too, that all religious compromises would bring disaster and defeat in the end. He claimed that the one essential upon the mission fields, in the mission boards and everywhere else is whole-hearted devotion and unswerving loyalty to the divine Son of God, while at the dictates of circumstances we may become all things to all men that by all means we may save some.

One paper that created much interest and some animated discussion was the one read by Dr. Barton, in answer to the skillful, diplomatic address recently made by the Buddhist priests of Japan "to the ecclesiastics of the world." This address was published in the New York Independent recently and was characterized as a most extraordinary document. The purport of the paper evidently is to persuade the boards to withdraw their missionaries from China, leaving the field to Buddhism. Dr. Barton's reply will be published with the other reports.

One of the most important advance steps taken by the conference was the formation of a "Bureau of Missionary Information" in this city, under the direction of a committee of eighteen persons. Six of the members of this committee are to go out of office each year and six new members are to be elected in their places. The object of this Bureau is to collect, file and disseminate missionary intelligence of all kinds. Doubtless it will fill a long-felt need.

I would suggest that all who wish a report of these discussions should send an order for the same to A. McLean, Cincinnati. The cost will be about 25 cents per copy. The conference adjourned on the 18th to meet in February of next year in Toronto, Canada, in the same week as the meeting of the Students' Volunteer League in that city.

The Representatives of Woman's Boards were in session in the city at the same time. Reports state that they had a most excellent conference.

On Saturday, Jan. 12, Miss Ella M. Maddock and Miss Bessie Farrar sailed from this port on the S. S. "Servia," Cunard Line, for Liverpool on their return to the mission field in India. After a furlough of a few months and rest, they are anxious to get back to their work among the needy of that great land. We had the pleasure of having Miss Farrar in our home for a short time, as when she sailed before. She says she has come now to feel that India is her home and while in America that she is only on a visit. This identification of one's field of work with the home thought is proper and right and will bring much comfort and contentment with it. Miss Maddock and Miss Farrar seem to be very happy in the prospect of returning to what they call "Our India."

As far as news items indicate, the cause of the Disciples of Christ is prospering throughout the east as never before. The work in all the churches of the metropolis is on the up-grade and from the saints in sister cities of the Atlantic Slope come words of good cheer and encouragement. The cause in Newark at our mission church is hopeful. The churches in Philadelphia are pushing the work with all possible speed. In Pittsburg the primitive gospel is winning. Bro. T. E. Cramblett's report at "East End" is very encouraging. Baltimore never presented a brighter outlook. Washington, the capital city, goes on to victory under her excellent quartette of preachers. We hope to arrange soon for another eastern conference to meet in May. Where shall we meet? What shall be the topics for consideration? Who shall lead in the discussion of each? Let us hear from the eastern preachers on these questions.

Medical Missions in China.

Elliott I. Osgood, M. D.

While medical work, like all other in all heathen countries, is beset with many discouragements, still there arise now and then cases which pay for all the heartaches endured because of the ingratitude and evil in the many.

Dr. Macklin has for years pursued the policy of picking up every sick and dying beggar he saw by the wayside, bringing them to his hospital and saving them if possible; if impossible, giving them at least a comfortable place in which to die.

On taking a jinricksha ride one day he tendered the usual fee to the man, who refused it. Supposing that the man was simply asking a higher fee Dr. Macklin felt like rebuking the man but soon found him to be one of these beggars whose life he had saved. "When you saved my life, do you think I want pay for serving you?" said the man, and he refused all fees.

A poor farmer had run a thorn into his heel. The sore began to fester until the whole heel became involved and the flesh sloughed off. In this condition he entered the "beggar's ward." The doctor cleaned and cared for the wound for some months. The man left the hospital and begged all summer. In the autumn he again returned with his foot much worse. The bones were exposed. He stayed in the hospital some time and expressed a wish to be baptized. Fearing that the man was after the "loaves and fishes," the doctor hesitated for some time, but the man showed such eagerness he finally consented.

The illiterate man at once began to pick up all the knowledge he could and in a few months was able to read the New Testament. He propagated his belief among the beggars and other patients until no less than seventy have been baptized, the direct result of his preaching. He is not perfect but he is in earnest and has been wonderfully used of God.

A demented patient was brought in to Dr. Macklin. He appeared a hopelessly insane case. He would tear his clothes off and throw things at the patients in the ward, though rarely becoming furious. One night he wrapped his bed blanket about his naked body and went out into the winter cold. A few days later he came back with feet and hands blue and frozen. The doctor worked half the night to save the feet.

Strange to say in a few days the man fully recovered his mind and recalled his past. He stayed in the hospital for some time and was set to instructing the beggars, which he did gladly and gratefully. He shows very marked evidences of becoming a follower of Christ.

To some of us, one of the most marked cases that have come from under the doctor's care is Evangelist Shi. He was a story-teller among the Chinese and mingled with the very lowest classes. The opium habit was firmly knit into his nature and swallowed up most of his earnings until he lived under bridges and gateways or such places as afforded temporary shelter.

He heard the gospel and believed and entered the opium refuge connected with the hospital to break off the habit. Seven times he fell back into the awful habit but finally prayer prevailed and he became a free man in Christ. To this day, however, the smell of an opium den brings back the craving. He is kept "moment by moment."

He voluntarily went back to his home and enduring the persecution of his neighbors, preached the gospel to them. A church of 35 members is one of the results. Through all the Chu Cheo district Evangelist Shi is known and respected.

Dr. Boone, of Shanghai, gives another interesting case. A member of another mission recently related to him the following story. In the northern part of Kiang Su province while a missionary was itinerating through a town to which foreigners had not previously come, he was followed by a crowd of boys and local roughs who pelted him with mud, bricks and other missiles. As he hurried along looking for some place of refuge a well dressed Chinaman standing at the door of a fine native house pulled him in and shut the door.

He apologized for the boys in true oriental style and calling in his friends from among the literary classes expressed a desire to hear the doctrine of Christ. The missionary was thus entertained several days and kept busy teaching the gospel. A church of over 30 members is the result. When asked why he befriended the foreigner and desired to hear the gospel, he told the following story. Twelve years before while visiting Shanghai on business he fell sick. It did not take long for all his money to go. The landlord was about to throw him out into the street, Chinese fashion, when by the intervention of some of the tradesmen he was taken to Dr. Boone's hospital and there freely treated until he recovered.

The kind, brotherly attention led him to listen to the gospel and when leaving the hospital he carried with him a desire to know more of this heavenly doctrine, a desire he had treasured for twelve years with the above result.

Such cases show the value of medical missions and are of great encouragement in the work.

The Greatest Miracle.

A short time ago I was sitting upon the piazza of that great caravansary—the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga Springs. It was the height of the season and vast crowds, representing every condition of life, moved upon the streets. I was one of a party coming from several states, meeting for the first time at this hotel. It was an intelligent party, and subjects of interest were discussed, and finally Ingersoll was mentioned, his life and work discussed, and I was astonished to find that each member of the party was a philosopher—so-called—and scoffed at the superstition of people who could believe in miracles or deviations from the laws of nature in mind or matter. I am not a polemic, and not given to discussion, which too often degenerates into mere wrangling, but my heart burned within me, and turning to the chief intellect and chief talker of the group, I said, "You could not accept the fact that there had ever been a miraculous occurrence?" He said he certainly could not. Then said I, "Let me tell you a story. Centuries ago there appeared in the hill country of Judea a Jewish peasant. He was poor. He was without influence. He claimed to have a mission. He went about giving utterance to sentiments and doctrines that were marvelous for that degenerate time, and for that matter, for any time. He gathered about him what we would call a motley company of followers, who were without standing or influence. All society, all the forces of organized government and of religion held him, his followers and his claims in contempt. These forces speedily brought him to his death. His inconsequential friends and adherents went their ways, the book of this brief transaction was closed and the waves of oblivion swept it from the memory of men. That is the natural, the philosophic, the non-miraculous view of the subject—there can be no other. But it was not so ended. These men did not go their ways in this sense, but they did something astonishing in its character. They went before the world with an incredible story. They said this crucified one had risen from the dead, that he had ascended to heaven, that he was in truth the Son of God and had returned to his Father and had entrusted to them a mission, and that was to save men from their sins through belief of this incredible story. Incredible from the standpoint of human reason and human experience. It could not be true—men could not accept such a story. It must fall flat upon human ears and its propagators be placed in the category of harmless lunatics. But men did believe it, nevertheless, and it has come down the ages. Wherever it has gone the human race has been elevated. It has been the handmaid of civilization. It has been the comfort and joy of untold millions in life, and in that supreme moment in every life—the hour of death—it has solaced and comforted an untold multitude, and it yet lives and leavens and comforts, the continuing and greatest miracle the world has ever known."

My companions were probably unconvinced, but they were silenced and admitted the force of the statement. If the statement did them no good it at least did me good. It does one good to stand up for one's faith, and it started trains of thought which have enabled me to be indifferent to criticism, whether "higher" or lower. The miraculous establishment of the Christian religion—its continuance, its effects—make it sure that is divine, and that ends the controversy with me. The vexed questions do not worry me. Luke may have been inspired or not (I do not see that he claims anything but accuracy), but he has given us the most beautiful book in the world, and it carries truth on its face.

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY of CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

By Allan B. Philputt

Trustee of the United Society

February 2, 1901, will mark the twentieth mile-post of Christian Endeavor. The Trustees of the United Society will hold a "retreat" for conference and prayer January 31 to February 3, at Portland, Me., when a beautiful bronze tablet, the gift of Endeavorers from all parts of the world, will be unveiled. A celebration like this at the birthplace of the movement will, no doubt, bring together a great multitude, and the meetings will be marked by deep spiritual power. It is not inappropriate at this time to raise the question of the value of the movement to our churches and to the whole church of God. The statistics show a total membership of 3,636,060 in 60,601 societies.

The diffusion of Christian Endeavor among the nations is even more wonderful than the size of its membership. It has literally girdled the globe. China and Japan, India and South Africa, Turkey, Germany, France and Spain, England, Scotland and Australia, in fact every country under the sun can be counted in this international and interracial movement. This rapid and marvelous growth may seem to some a sure prophecy of its speedy decline, for as a rule that which comes easily goes easily. Twenty years, however, is not so brief a time, and when we consider the vigor which yet characterizes the organization we are certainly precluded from prophesying an immediate decline.

It may be admitted that Christian Endeavor does not appeal to all temperaments alike and to many not at all. But there are some who cannot endure preaching. Formal prayer is a burden to many. A few could get along very well if the contribution box were never passed. It is not necessary that all should be Endeavorers. I wonder that it gathers such numbers as it does, for it is a vow of special consecration in definite directions. Its weakness, if it have any, is not in want of numbers, but in the possession of them. It is no great criticism that many will not go into it. It is a very serious one that any large per cent. should allow the pledge to rest lightly upon them. Does it fill a long-felt want in the church? I feel sure that it does. It calls out a force of workers that otherwise would be left in the background. Young people will not naturally come forward in the church where there is no young people's society, and the last thing in the world to happen would be for the older people to urge them forward. The young people who will not join the society are not as a rule as heartsome and helpful as those who do.

Any large success in reaching people will be found to depend upon creating a certain atmosphere of warmth and cordiality in the church, just such an atmosphere as Christian Endeavor will create. I can illustrate from my own observation. My second service is not as largely attended as the first and is composed in large part of outside people. There was, in spite of all I could do, a coldness about it, for the audience were largely strangers to each other. Upon my presenting the case to our Endeavor Society they cheerfully agreed to make the evening meeting a special object of effort. Forty or fifty of them scatter about well back in the church and it is now one of the warmest and most attractive meetings, especially for young men and women, that we have. They welcome strangers and get them acquainted. Another thing I have noticed much of late is the promptness with which flowers are sent to the sick and the sorrowing, the number of little cottage prayer-meetings that are held where desired, the calling upon new people, and the sending of letters to distant ones.

Then there has grown up a generation quick to sympathize with the pastor in all his higher ideals and aspirations for the church. This I count the finest fruit of all. Do you want a series of meetings? The Endeavorers are ready for it. Have you a burning message to give to the people about the common matters of piety—something they so much need but which they hear with languor? The Endeavorers understand you and reiterate and enforce your sermon. For a man to preach at his best he must be aware of responsive hearers. Christian Endeavor furnishes responsive hearers.

Then what can be said of the religious habits, giving, church attendance, public testimony and prayer, personal work of all kinds, in which they are trained, and which in turn give them a practical and abiding interest in the duties of the church? It is noticeable that our congregations are coming to depend upon these trained young people more and more for many things. As a rule where you see a live Christian Endeavor Society you see a live, progressive church. And the opposite is true, that where there is no society there is coldness and formality. I have three societies in my own church and I would not willingly spare one of them, for I see distinct good done by them all.

I have not space to speak at length of remoter, yet no less important, aspects of the movement. It has an educational side to it. The study of the Bible and the readings along the line of historical and missionary literature are of immense value. It is proving itself also a mighty factor in the formation of a better public sentiment on moral issues and has thus improved our citizenship. The influence of such a vast body of young people cannot be confined within the limits of formal religious channels. It is bound to overflow and reach the widest limits of life.

It is not contended in this article that Christian Endeavor in all its details as applied to every place is above criticism, but it is contended that it has been and is a great good to the church. I have read, and with appreciation, the criticisms that have been made upon it, but I have seen none as yet that were ominous, or that might not be made upon anything human and hence imperfect. It is doubtless true that some people, and very good people too, find little sympathy with the formal side of the Endeavor program. I should not like to be pastor of a church made up solely of this type of people. I believe if pastors and church leaders would make more use of their young people's societies, showing a deeper sympathy with, and appreciation of them, they would find in them a splendid and abiding element of strength.

After twenty years then we behold not a waning, spiritless movement, burnt out by its too ardent zeal, but a mighty army with steadier, if a trifle slower, pace of veterans in service, having the swing of achievement and victory.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

I thank you for calling my attention to what Mr. Hall Caine is saying concerning war and the twentieth century. His position is good; mine is better! He thinks that this century will see the end of war; I believe that there will never be another great war. Xerxes invaded Greece with an army of 5,000,000. Never again will an army of that size be seen. The Tai Ping rebellion in China began in 1850 and ended in 1864. It is estimated that during that period 20,000,000 persons lost their lives. The world will never again see such a slaughter of human beings.

War as conducted in recent years is too expensive—the people will not have it. The wars of Napoleon in thirteen years cost a billion dollars; our Civil War in four years cost four billion. The common people now have a voice in the inauguration, the prosecution and the conclusion of war. The same people pay the bills. More and more the common people are coming to the front. Their voice is more potent than at any previous period in the history of the race. The time was when kings reigned. The common people now reign. The President of the United States is but little more than general manager of our great corporation in which are 76,000,000 freemen. When he does not please a majority of the shareholders he will be dismissed and another will take his place. Those whom we call rulers are our servants. The people will not go to war on a large scale or for a long time. The Spanish-American war was not a great war. The war in South Africa is not a great war. England is learning a lesson, too. She is learning it at such a cost that she will probably remember it. Her army officers belong to her aristocracy. The aristocracy is playing out. A man like Gen. Grant could not obtain a place in the British army. This explains why 200,000 English soldiers have not been able, in a year and a half, to subdue 30,000 Boer farmers. These statements do not touch the merits of the South African war. I do not intend in this letter to say anything on that subject. I mean to say, in the first place, that the English officers are incompetent; they belong to the aristocracy, and the aristocracy is not now made of the stuff out of which great military men are made. In the second place I mean to say that England has come to the reign of the common people. Democracy is triumphant not only in the United States, but in the United Kingdom as well, and the common people are forging to the front around the world. Kings now consult, as in times past they did not, the wishes of the people.

Do you point to the great armies of France, Germany, Russia? These great armies are in the interest of peace. England and the United States are not favorable to large armies. England has not a large standing army. That of the United States is pitifully small. If the United States had had an army in the spring of '98 of 200,000 men there would have been no Spanish-American war. Spain would not, in such a case, have sneered at us as "pigs."

Money is power. The wealth of the country was never so generally distributed among the people as now. The average size of an American farm in 1850 was 203 acres, in 1860 it was 199 acres, in 1870 it was 153 acres, in 1880 it was 134 acres, and in 1890 it was 136 acres. Consult the statistics of the savings banks. The number of depositors in the savings banks in New York state exceeds the number of voters. Spend some time in a savings bank and study the people who put money in and draw money out. They are the common people. No one person is allowed to have more than $3,000 in one of these banks. Look at these figures. The assets of the Bank of Savings in the City of New York are more than $64,000,000; of the Bowery Savings Bank, more than $74,000,000; of the Citizens' Savings Bank, more than $14,000,000; of the Franklin Savings Bank, more than $9,000,000; of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank, more than $65,000,000; of the East River Savings Institution, more than $15,000,000; and of the Irving Savings Institution, the assets are more than $11,000,000. To whom do these millions on millions belong? Almost exclusively to the common people. The institutions here named are all in New York city; but the same story is true of the whole land, to a large degree. The wealth of the country is passing into the hands of the industrious, temperate, frugal people. Let me give you a few facts about the great corporations. You say the workingmen no longer have a chance, that the stock of the great railway corporations and manufacturing concerns is in the hands of a few rich men who grind the faces of the poor. What are the facts? I take the statistics of two steel rail mills. In the first the number of shareholders is 215; 7 of them are employes of the company, 32 are estates, representing how many persons I do not know, and 57 are women. In the second the number of stockholders is 302, of whom 101 are women, 29 are estates, and 20 are employes. In a large cotton mill there are 2,500 stockholders; 42 per cent. own one share, 21 per cent. own two shares, 10 per cent. own three shares, and only 27 per cent. hold over three shares. Is it necessary to inquire who owns the controlling interest in the Merrimac Manufacturing Company?

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the New York Central are two of the great and enormously rich railway companies of the world. Will you believe me when I tell you that the number of persons owning stock in the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is greater than the number of men in the employ of the company? Whether you believe me nor not, such is the case. The number of different persons owning stock is 19,340; the number of men in the service of the company is 18,911. When you think of the New York Central Company you think of the Vanderbilts, Chauncy Depew and Dr. Webb, and you say, "They own the New York Central." Do they? The number of different persons owning stock in this great corporation is 10,418.

The common people are coming into actual possession and control of the unparalleled wealth of the United States—the richest country on the face of the globe. What does this signify? It means more than any man can comprehend for the good of the entire race. This is distinctly in the interest of peace and against war. Business will not permit a great war.

Do you recall a great strike in Philadelphia? Is it possible for you to recall anything of the kind in Chicago? What makes the difference between Philadelphia and Chicago at this point? For one thing, the so-called workingman in Philadelphia owns his home; in Chicago he does not. With the workingman, so-called, in Philadelphia something of importance is at stake; in Chicago this is not the case. In one city there is a sense of responsibility; in the other, comparatively speaking, there is not. In one city there may at almost any time be war; in the other it is almost impossible to inaugurate an industrial war. Why? You know. Now apply this principle to the nations and tell me, Will this earth ever again be the scene of a great war?

Offensive Illustrations.

By J. W. Harris.

Many times have my feelings been ruffled by harsh allusions and thorny comparisons. I am sure that sermons and articles would be more effective for good were writers more careful in selecting facts and metaphors.

I am moved to write this note of caution by this sentence in a recent number of the Ladies Home Journal: "Sez I: That's the way the Mormons prove their doctrine out of the Bible, and the Campbellites; they read it trying to find proofs of their beliefs; that is the way you read me."

Now of the two or three millions of readers of this popular Journal, at least two or three hundred thousand must feel that the people with whom they stand and the plea they advocate have been needlessly slandered by this untruthful statement.

"They read it trying to find proofs of their doctrine." Miss Holley, listen, over a million Disciples of Christ exclaim: "Shame upon you for this false fling and gratuitous insult."

While this is fresh in mind, will the great host of editors, preachers and other writers of our brotherhood allow a suggestion from a rustic farmer teacher and preacher away down in the backwoods of Mississippi? It is this: Try to be considerate of the feelings of your readers in your flowers of rhetoric and rifle-shots of logic.

For example: Thousands of us feel that injustice is done us and our section when writers couple Mormonism and Slavery, Rum and Rebellion. Some orators seem to think they have attained the very Pike's Peak of sublimity when they plant their feet wide apart, fill their lungs with fresh oxygen, and with clenched fists and fiery eyes thunder out: "Rebel, treason, traitor, rebellion!"

Dear brethren, in our hearts we plead not guilty, or worthy of such sound and fury. We are like Rev. Job Harrell's neighbors, when charged with being peasants. Dr. J. R. Graves visited Bro. H. He noticed the disparity between pastor and people and said: "Bro. Harrell, you are a prince among peasants, and should move to better society." Some sisters heard of the remark and called on Sister H. to complain. "No, no, Sister H., Mr. H. be no prince and us be no pheasants."

Our ablest Mississippi preacher, Bro. T. W. Caskey often offended by illustrations. For example, he said: "The mourner's bench and the Bible stand thus" (and he crossed his index fingers). At another time: "I can tell an Episcopalian by his carriage." In discussing apostolic succession, after disposing of the claims of Roman, Greek and English churches, he added: "And now in the latter half of the nineteenth century bobs up 'Young America,' the Baptists, with the same ridiculous claim." I need not add that very few of the denominations in that section ever heard Bro. C. again.

Many remember the fatal rhetoric of Dr. Burchard, of New York, when he so euphoniously strung together three words, and said: "Democracy is the party of Rome, Rum and Rebellion." The remark cost the Republicans New York and the presidency.

A well-known politician says he has lost votes by this story: "A preacher saw a boy fishing with a pin-hook on Sunday. The minister remonstrated with buddy. Buddy curtly invited him to go about his business. Just then the boy caught a fish. The preacher asked the kind. The boy answered: 'It is a Campbellite fish, because it dies as soon as it comes out of the water.'"

The writer has had some 40 years' experience in pulpit and school. I have lost friends and made enemies by strong figures, among children, parents and hearers. My intentions were good and the metaphors justifiable, I thought. On the other hand I have never regretted trying to follow the principle implied in the proverb: "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

For two sessions—1859-1861—I heard Mr. Campbell's lectures and sermons at Bethany College. He never used a word, epithet, allusion or comparison to which any reasonable person could object. I earnestly wish that writers and speakers of every name would imitate this style of Campbellism. But, alas, many a gun—big and little—would never wake the echoes again, for want of ammunition.

The lesson I draw from these premises is that we cannot be too careful in the use of illustrations. Above all, keep within the bounds of fact and truth. And even when these would allow, it may be best to omit the keen dart, the thorn, the barbed wire.

Evolution at Bartlett's Landing

By BURRIS A. JENKINS

CHAPTER III. (CONTINUED.)

A month later than the delivery of this sermon, the night was once more gathering about the doors of the Bartlett's home, about the red oak in the grass-plot, about the double geraniums and midsummer roses along the flagstones of the walk, and about the picket gate, wide open. Bareheaded, the patriarchal elder stood within upon the walk; bareheaded in the growing dusk, the young graduate, fair and tall, true descendant of the Saxons, stood without upon the road. Both men looked grave and determined. They perfectly understoood each other and knew that intellectual truce between them was impossible.

"Good-bye, Henry. I cannot wish you joy of your work as I once could. You are not the same."

"No, Elder, I am not the same."

"You are not true to the faith once delivered to the saints. This month long I have labored with you. Now I give you up. I pray that you may be turned from your errors. I do not pray that you may be prospered in your work. I pray that you fail, that your hopes crumble, that the people flee from you. I can have no fellowship with the works of darkness, or pray for Babylon's prosperity. You are full of sectarianism, and the word of the Lord says to me, 'Come out from among them, my people, and be ye separate.' Good-bye. We cannot walk the same ways any more."

These words were spoken deliberately, without vocal tremor; yet the stars caught the twinkle of a tear and in heaven, let us hope, that tear covered a multitude of intolerances.

Henry stood silent, trembling, shaken. Love for his foster-father seemed uppermost—grieved love. Love for the woman—daughter of this strong, gentle, yet immovable man and true daughter of such a father—struggled underneath. He saw no outlook. The Elder had passed his command to his child and Henry felt that nothing could alter the paternal law.

"Good-bye, then, Elder," he managed at last to say brokenly, as he reached out his hand.

Bartlett stood, looking down the road, his hands locked behind him.

"Will you not take my hand, sir?"

"No. I cannot."

"And there is no way out of this?"

"None, unless you change."

"And—Jane?"

"I have told her you are not for each other."

"Can I not sometimes see her?"

"Not with my consent. It's better not."

"And you?"

"Our ways sometimes must cross, perhaps; but the less often the better until you come back into the old paths again."

"Good-bye, then, sir."

"Good-bye."

Henry turned down the road, while the old man moved towards the house. Under the red oak, half way up the walk, he looked back at the retreating figure, then, reaching out his hands, a sob burst from his breast,

"My son, my son Absalom. Would God I had died—"

Further utterance was choked. His wife peering from the upper window thought she saw some one kneeling under the great tree, in the dark night, and heard a shaking voice:

"Father, let me use the words of thy Son; if this cup may not pass from me except I drink it, thy will—thy will be done."

Meanwhile Henry passed down the hardest road he had ever traveled. Suddenly a voice, almost at his shoulder, called his name, and he remembered he was near the stile.

Jane stood waiting at the well. In an instant he was at her side, and would have taken her in his arms.

"No. You know what father says."

"Yes," he said sadly, "and you will obey."

"Yes, I'll obey."

"There is no hope for us, Jane?"

"I see none."

"O, there is hope somewhere! There must be! He will change!"

"You know him, Henry, and you know he will not change. Nor will you change. Though you may be extreme, yet years will not materially alter your thought. The world is moving your way, and neither it nor you will turn back. But father will not move forward."

"You are in sympathy with my thinking, Jane?"

"Perfectly."

"Then there must be hope. Why, if you think as I do, doesn't he cast you off, too?"

"Because he doesn't know my thoughts. There's no need that he should know."

Henry, suspecting an implied reproach, said quickly: "Do you mean that I should have kept mine from him?"

"Perhaps. But then the case is different with you. Men traffic mostly with ideas; women, with emotions; and thank God love is the same in all hearts."

"But I cannot compromise the truth. Woe is me, if I speak not what I think," returned Henry vehemently.

"Yes, yes," she hastened, "Speak what you please, tempering all with love. You will, I know. You will draw all men to you—all but my father. He is different."

"I wouldn't have you disobey him, Jane, but am I never to see you?"

"We are not so far apart but that now and then we must meet. Ten miles to Liberty—we shall be compelled to meet at protracted meetings and county gatherings. Besides, though father will not let me hear you preach, he will allow me to come when Campbell, or Stone, or John Smith, or Ben Franklin are at your church.

"O yes, but am I never to see you alone?"

"Well—" and a gleam of the old roguishness of the girl came into the woman's eyes. "Well—time doesn't do away with wells, does it? Here is the water and here is the gourd, and you know my old customs, and—if any of your flock should stray this far, the pastor ought to—"

Henry immediately broke all rules of propriety. Jane struggled a moment in vain, and finally, the fountains of the restrained grief of weeks broken up, she sobbed in his arms.

"Bless those tears" murmured Henry, at the same time doing something more effective to those tears than merely bless.

After a further half hour of conference, Henry, much rebuked and much warned as to future exemplary conduct—supposing any sheep should stray—went stepping down the road to his mother's home with head erect, and with hope shining through the clouds of his face, as the evening star above the red oak now gleamed from among the billows of the sky.

Trust Rewarded.

C. H. Wetherbe.

He who trusts in God with constant firmness is rewarded in several ways. In the first place, the trusting one allies himself with an Almighty God. This is a reward which has no limit in value. In the second place, such an one thereby secures eternal life, which is priceless. In the third place, the trusting one receives many special favors through life, such as those who do not trust God do not receive. In recently reading the book of Jeremiah I was especially interested in the case of Ebed-melech, an Ethiopian, who was a servant in King Zedekiah's house. It is said that he was the king's slave. Jeremiah, because he had prophesied that the people of Judah should be carried into Babylon and become the prisoners of that king, was put into prison, a terrible dungeon, by the order of Zedekiah. Ebed-melech, hearing of Jeremiah's imprisonment, interceded with the king in the prophet's behalf and secured his release from that dungeon, although he was still held as a prisoner. Now notice the special reward which came to this humble servant, this slave: "Now the word of the Lord came unto Jeremiah, while he was shut up in the court of the guard, saying, Go and speak to Ebed-melech, the Ethiopian, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold I will bring my words upon this city for evil, and not for good; and they shall be accomplished before thee in that day. But I will deliver thee in that day, saith the Lord; and thou shalt not be given into the hand of the men of whom thou art afraid. For I will surely save thee, and thou shalt not fall by the sword, but thy life shall be for a prey unto thee, because thou hast put thy trust in me, saith the Lord." What a cheering and valuable message this was to that slave Ebed-melech! I do not suppose that he had expected such a thing The news of that great reward must have been an overwhelming surprise to him. He had trusted in the Lord, yet amid fear and trembling. He had risked his life and was constantly in danger; but he did his duty, as best he knew how, committing himself to the Lord. We ought to be made more courageous by this fine example.

Current Literature.

It is not often that the man who has accumulated large wealth is the wisest adviser as to the proper use of it. Mr. Andrew Carnegie seems to be an exception to the rule. His Gospel of Wealth is as good a treatise on the responsibilities and right use of wealth as we have seen. His view is that the accumulation of large wealth in the hands of a comparatively small number is an inevitable consequence of our present industrial system, and he holds that this is not necessarily a curse but may be a blessing to the many. Communism would be a good deal worse than the present system. Of the three ways of disposing of wealth—transmitting it to one's children, bequeathing it at one's death to benevolent purposes and administering it while one is living for the public good—he holds that the last mentioned is the only proper way. Children, he believes, are cursed by wealth, and to give at one's death is not giving at all, but is having one's wealth torn from him. Besides one can never feel sure that his will disposing of his wealth will be carried out. The superintendence which a wise business man gives to the use of his wealth for the public good while he is living is worth quite as much perhaps as the money itself. Among the wise uses to which wealth may be given he mentions the endowment of universities and colleges, the establishment of free public libraries, where a city or town will pledge itself to keep them up, public parks, hospitals and the building of churches in communities where needed, but never endowing them, museums, art galleries, public halls, swimming baths for the people, etc. Mr. Carnegie's predilection for free libraries is explained by the delight and profit he experienced as a boy in having free access, in common with others, to a large private library whose generous owner made this concession to public good. There are other chapters in the book besides those treating of the gospel of wealth, which show Mr. Carnegie to be a man of considerable literary ability as well as an able financier.

The Introduction, giving the author's experience as an apprentice in Pittsburg, and how he rose from one step to another, might be read with profit by every boy in the land. The chapters on the gospel of wealth ought to be printed separately and read extensively by all men of large means. Mr. Carnegie accepts Christ's language about rich men and the camel and the needle's eye, very literally, and declares that "to die thus rich is to die disgraced." (The Century Co.)

Among the best of recent arguments against war is Put Up Thy Sword, by James H. MacLaren. The author adopts the epistolary form and imagines an exchange of letters between Mr. Brain and Mr. Brawn. He is entitled to the credit of stating the chief arguments for war fairly and plausibly, though he mingles with them many which are not likely to be made by any thoughtful person. Indeed, we doubt whether he has not stated arguments in justification of war under some circumstances which he has not been able to answer. He undertakes to prove that all war, that is to say, all use of force by one nation in dealing with another, is unChristian and anti-Christian. To say that Christ, while not explicitly denouncing war, "condemned that spirit of envy, selfishness and retaliation out of which war springs," proves only that wars springing from such motives are anti-Christian—and that no one denies. The only point worth arguing is whether there are not cases in which a righteous end can be attained only by the use of force. Heartrending descriptions of the horrors of war are not to the point. Every one knows about them. But so far as the reviewer could find there is in the book no answer to the argument that military force is as necessary in preventing and putting an end to the wrongdoings of nations as police force is to the suppression of disorderly individuals. Perhaps the author does not believe in police. At any rate it should be borne in mind that an anti-war argument based upon the major premise that the use of force in controlling men is always wrong, cannot logically stop with the denunciation of war, but must extend to the condemnation of all methods other than moral suasion for controlling criminal, vicious or mischievous individuals. It is of no consequence to the author's argument, but is perhaps worth mentioning, that his statement that every gift to a university by the head of the Standard Oil trust is accompanied by a raising of the price of the product and that "this has been repeated so often as to become almost unbearable" is completely inaccurate. The methods of the octopus are bad enough, no doubt, but it is just as well still to tell the truth about it. (Revell. $.75)

Few will read Irving Bacheller's Eben Holden, a Tale of the North Country, without being reminded of David Harum. In both books the plot is of secondary importance and the chief interest centers in a single character, and in both the personality of this elderly and unromantic hero quite eclipses the love story. The similarity extends even to such a detail as the description of a shrewd horse-bargain. But Eben Holden is so far superior to David Harum that the older book is too much honored by the comparison. It has the same virtues of absolute simplicity, naked truth and unfailing human interest and it adds to them the charm of a literary style which was strikingly, and at times painfully, lacking in David Harum. Moreover, Uncle Eb utters even more and better maxims than David ever did and, when it comes to a horse trade, his shrewdness is quite as great and his morals much better. It is pre-eminently a placid book, with something of the flavor of "The Cricket on the Hearth," especially toward the end, and even the introduction of stirring scenes in New York before the war, whither the young man goes and gets a position under Greeley on the Tribune, and the scene of the battlefield of Bull Run, cannot destroy that general effect of placidity. The course of true love runs smoother here than it often does in stories and there are no rivals worth mentioning. To be sure some thorns are forcibly stuck in the path of the lovers, in the latter part, and a not very novel denouement is introduced to give dash to the close of the story. These are the nearest approaches to conventionality, and artistically the least perfect features of the story. But by the time the reader has gotten so far he is in no frame of mind to criticise. Altogether it is difficult to imagine a more refreshing, invigorating and healthy story for young or old. (Lothrop, Boston. $1.50.)

No more fascinating book of personal memories of notable men ever appeared from an American press than W. D. Howells' Literary Friends and Acquaintances, which is further described as "a personal retrospect of American authorship." It is a wholly charming book. Mr. Howells' acquaintance with literary men began in 1860 when, at the age of 23 and being at the time the contributor of a few poems to the Atlantic Monthly, he visited Boston. Here, as a budding man of letters, he met the great men of that day—the Boston group, the Cambridge group and the Concord group. The brightest spot in this visit was a little dinner at the Parker House with Lowell, Holmes and Fields, when Howells, being already man enough to move, though as a neophyte, in such society, was yet boy enough to look up with blind adoration to the two great writers and the great publisher. Mr. Howells' early career affords an encouraging example to the young writer who is seeking an entrance into the world of letters, for during his four years at Venice he was, he says, constantly sending poems to magazines in every part of the English-speaking world, all of which, with the exception of three, were returned to him as promptly as mails would carry them. But two years after he had surrendered his consulate, he was editor of the Atlantic Monthly, the foremost literary magazine of the country. It is a delight to read the reminiscences of a man who has feelings and opinions and intellectual preferences, but no antipathies or grievances toward any of his contemporaries. He drags no skeleton from any man's closet and, though he is frank with the reader as friend with friend, he does not leave you thinking worse of any human being than you did before you read his book. (Harper & Bros. $2.50.)

We have never had a genuine history of American Literature, written upon broad lines, until Professor Barrett Wendell's A Literary History of America. There are volumes of charming reminiscence such as those of Thomas Wentworth Higginson and that of Mr. Howells (mentioned above); there are discursive works like Donald G. Mitchell's delightful volumes; there are text books of American literature like Julian Hawthorn's and Bronson's. But this is the first genuine history for the reader and the student. It is a monumental work of nearly 600 meaty pages. The author shuns verbosity like the true literary artist that he is, but he takes time and room to say what he has to say. And so he has produced, not a syllabus or a text book, but a real contribution to literature as well as to literary history. Professor Wendell, perhaps wisely, shuns the thankless task of recording his judgment of the literary products of the last decade or two. It is so difficult for the critic of current literature to rise to the dignity of a historian and so difficult for one who seeks to speak with authority of the books which the public is engaged in vigorously liking or disliking without being either commonplace or sensational, that it is just as well not to undertake it. Within its limits, from 1600 to the Civil War, it unquestionably presents the best connected account of American literature that has yet been written. (Scribner. $3.)

Architect's Food.

Grape-Nuts Turned into Big Buildings.

The duties of an architect are so multitudinous, looking after the thousand and one details required in the construction of large buildings, that many of them suffer from the constant mental application and require the best of food to keep up their work. The chief draughtsman in the office of R. T. Newberry, architect, at 1227 New York Life Building, Chicago, by name, Henry C. Hengels, says:

"After nine months' constant application in the preparation of the necessary plans and details for the large hotel known as the Post Tavern and the Post Building, at Battle Creek, as well as several other large institutions, I found myself in a very debilitated and dyspeptic condition and unfit for work.

"Instead of medical treatment, I used Grape-Nuts food in place of the usual breakfast cereals. The first few days gave great encouragement, and after a week's use, quite an appreciable improvement manifested itself. Since then, daily use has entirely restored the digestive functions to their natural healthy condition, and I have gained about one pound per week. I am now entirely well and strong again and am able to apply myself to work with more than usual vigor. I consider Grape-Nuts a most valuable food for all brain workers. The help this food has given me is incalculable."

Our Budget.

—It is time to begin active preparations for the March offering for Foreign Missions. Literature and supplies will be furnished free of charge by the Foreign Society, Box 884, Cincinnati, O. The society received an additional $500 for its annuity fund last week.

—F. B. Meyer, of London, who is widely known in this country as a writer of devotional books, will begin an evangelistic tour in America about March 15, starting at Atlanta, Ga., under the auspices of the Northfield Extension, a movement organized and for four or five years operated by Mr. Moody.

—Claude E. Hill, of Pleasant Hill, Mo., has been elected to the chaplaincy of the House of Representatives of the Missouri Legislature. We are sure his prayers for the law-makers and his personal influence will be on the side of some needed legislation in the interest of righteousness which should be enacted by the present legislature.

—J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., reports that his congregation is still reaping benefits from the new century banquet given the first night of the century. One of the city dailies, in speaking of the evangelistic spirit of the various churches this year, referred to it as "no doubt due in a large measure to the impetus of the remarkable meeting at the new century banquet given by the Christian Church."

—One of the strongest drawing cards at our Third Congress, to be held at Lexington, Ky., March 26-28, will be two addresses by Dr. Josiah Strong, author of "Our Country," "The New Era," "Expansion," etc. The subjects of his two addresses will be "The Twentieth Century City" and "Readjustments to Meet New Industrial and Social Conditions." These lectures will be in connection with the city evangelization section of the Congress.

—All Sunday-schools that have not yet remitted their Boys and Girls' Rally Day collection to B. L. Smith at Cincinnati, are requested to do so at once, as the division of the fund is about to be made. The offering shows a substantial gain over last year and the day is now doubtless permanently established as one of our great missionary days. Work has already been begun by P. Y. Pendleton and C. M. Fillmore on the Rally Day exercise for next year.

—Our enterprising contemporary, the Christian Century, of Chicago, has lately increased its size, made other improvements, and has announced an increase in price to $1.50, to take effect April 1. In the last issue it prints testimonials from readers pronouncing it now the ablest and best of all our religious journals. This is surely commendable progress, on which the paper is to be congratulated. We can testify to the excellent character of its contents and make-up, and sincerely wish it continued prosperity. The more able papers supported among us, the better it will be for the cause we in common plead, the success of which is the end for which religious journals are only means.

—The congregation at Worcester, Mass., one of our strongest churches in New England, of which Roland A. Nichols is pastor, is extending its influence into the country round about. One of the members of the congregation, Sister Nella C. Moore, has for some time been going out every Lord's day to the town of Dodge and holding services morning and evening in a private house. The attendance has grown from about twenty-five to an average of sixty. They have decided to organize a church and have made a substantial beginning toward the erection of a building. Sister Moore, who is leading this admirable piece of work, came to us not very many years ago from the Friends and was baptized by Bro. Nichols.

—J. H. Berkey, who has been at Monroe, Wis., for two years, has been called for a third.

—George G. Horne, now of Lakeville, Ind., will preach during the coming year at Kewanna, Fairview and Star City.

—George W. Hall, of Ellendale, N. D., writes: "A physician and a lawyer are needed here. There is no better opening anywhere for either or both."

—J. F. Sloan has one Lord's day a month not employed and will be glad to make an arrangement with some church for that time. 629 Tyler Street, Topeka, Kan.

—The North Side Christian Church of Omaha has issued invitations for its second annual Stag Social to be given by the pastor, W. T. Hilton, on Feb. 1. The toasts all deal with the general subject of The Twentieth Century Man.

—R. R. Hamlin, who has been pastor of the First Christian Church of Palestine, Tex., for five years, has accepted a call to McKinney, Tex., to succeed G. A. Faris, who has become editor of the Christian Courier. During Bro. Hamlin's pastorate at Palestine, 310 members were added to the church and one-third of all money raised went to benevolent and missionary causes.

—J. P. Myers, after a visit to Louisiana, Mo., where Bro. Mayhall has recently succeeded E. J. Lampton as pastor, says: "The brethren at Louisiana have one of the most modern and artistic buildings in the state for a church home, which stands as a monument to the untiring energy of Bro. E. J. Lampton, and they are to be congratulated on securing the services of Bro. Mayhall and wife, under whose leadership we predict a brilliant future for the church."

—Walter S. Smith, of Greenfield, Ind., reports the following from his neighborhood: The Harkins' meeting at Greenfield closed Jan. 22, with twelve additions, three by confession. T. H. Kuhn's meeting following the dedication at Fortville resulted in more than forty substantial accessions. Bro. Kuhn is state evangelist, a farmer and pastor of four churches. Our correspondent does not know whether his fifth Sunday is engaged or not. Some church ought to call him for those four Sundays a year to keep him from having too much leisure.

—Our efforts to furnish the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with a journal of superior excellence are meeting with hearty and substantial recognition. The letters which we daily receive, but which we have not the space to publish and to which we cannot find time to reply, are a source of great comfort and encouragement to us. Our subscription department pauses long enough in the work of registering both new and old subscriptions to reply to our inquiry concerning the tangible encouragement or concrete approbation by saying that the prospects are good for best record which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has ever made in the matter of circulation; even the splendid results of last year's work will have to be content with second place. Our subscription clerks are kept busy all day and often find it necessary to work in the evening in order to attend to the business of the department.

Scrofula

Few are entirely free from it.

It may develop so slowly as to cause little if any disturbance during the whole period of childhood.

It may then produce irregularity of the stomach and bowels, dyspepsia, catarrh, and marked tendency to consumption before manifesting itself in much cutaneous eruption or glandular swelling.

It is best to be sure that you are quite free from it, and for its complete eradication you can rely on

Hood's Sarsaparilla

The best of all medicines for all humors.

—It requires only $15 a year to feed, clothe and educate an orphan boy in the orphanage connected with our mission station at Damoh, India. There are 400 of them now in the orphanage, rescued from the famine. It will be a good work for the Endeavor Society of any church to assume the support of one of these boys. Five cents a day from the society will meet the expense.

—The Third Christian Church at Indianapolis, Ind., of which Carlos C. Rowlison is pastor, is doing an excellent social settlement work with its Neighborhood House. At the local council of woman's clubs on Jan. 2, Mr. Rowlison read a paper in regard to this work. While it is a general statement of the kinds of work which all such institutions aim to do, rather than a detailed report of this House, one is impressed with the fact that the Third Church Neighborhood House is disseminating a large amount of sunshine and genuine Christian helpfulness for its slight annual expenditure of $500.

—The church at Atchison, Kan., will make an heroic effort to pay off the remainder of its mortgage debt—$1,000—this year. To this end the pastor, Walter Scott Priest, would like to deliver some addresses during week nights within a hundred miles or so of Atchison, dividing the receipts between the church or the society and the debt fund. The addresses or lectures are as follows: 1. The Ceaseless Conflict; 2. Martin Luther and his Work; 3. The True Measure of a Man; 4. The Home Life of Alexander Campbell; 5. The Christian Endeavor Movement—Its Origin, Progress and Results; 6. Woman and Christianity.

—An interdenominational "Conference in the Interests of Federative Action Among Churches and Christian Workers Throughout the United States" will be held in Philadelphia, Feb. 5-6. The national committee which has this conference in charge, is composed of members representing the nine leading Protestant bodies of this country. Our own representative is S. T. Willis, the New York correspondent of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The purpose of the conference is thoroughly practical—not to discuss the theoretical beauty of perfect Christian union, but to examine the actual situation and see what things there are which the various denominations can do together. Some of the subjects to be discussed are "Federation in City Evangelization," "Co-operation in Home Missionary Work," "The Next Great Revival."

van Houten's Cocoa

combines Strength, Purity and Solubility. A breakfast-cupful of this delicious Cocoa costs less than one cent.

Sold at all grocery stores—order it next time.

—The new church at Ox Bow, Neb., where E. W. Yocum is pastor, was dedicated on Jan. 20, free from debt. The congregation was organized twenty-seven years ago by D. R. Dungan, and the occasion was celebrated both as anniversary and dedication day. Over half of the present membership has been brought into the church under the present pastor. The dedication sermon was preached by W. G. Menzies, of Smith Center, Kan., who also read a dedicatory poem composed by himself and wife.

—C. E. Palmer has resigned his work at the Park Church, New Albany, Ind., and will begin at Spencer, Ind., March 1. His pastorate at New Albany has lasted thirteen years—an unusually long period for us. About 400 members have been added during that time to the 142 which the church had at the beginning of the pastorate. Bro. Palmer says: "Then only two of the members could or would take part in the prayer-meeting; now half of the members can lead a prayer-meeting and can do all kinds of church work. The spiritual advancement has been even greater than the numerical." We stand greatly in need of such pastorates as this and such building up of churches in spirituality as well as numbers.

—The recent annual report of the Board of the Chautauqua Assembly shows the marvelous proportions to which this enterprise has grown. Its assets are nearly half a million dollars. Its receipts for the past year were more than $90,000. The enrollment at the summer school last year was 2,500, and 168 courses were given by 83 instructors, making it the largest summer school in the United States. The Chautauqua reading courses are pursued by over 300,000 persons in all parts of the world.

—Eureka College will celebrate its Founders' Day on Wednesday, Feb. 6. The principal address will be delivered by Prof. B. J. Radford. The college has recently received from Mrs. Harness-Tuttle, of Atlanta, Ill., $5,000 in cash to be used at once for library and apparatus. The biological, chemical and physical laboratories and the gymnasium will receive a share and each of the college departments will have from $250 to $500 to expend on new books. The first number of the Eureka College Bulletin will be issued about Feb. 1 and will contain an account of the proceedings on Founders' Day.

—We call attention to the program of the Missouri Christian Ministerial Institute which appears elsewhere in this issue. The Institute will be held at Fayette, beginning March 18. The speakers are men of known ability and the subjects are of vital importance. Let all the Missouri preachers who are intellectually awake, or who want to be, make arrangements to go, but do not allow it to interfere with attendance at the National Congress to be held the week following at Lexington, Ky.

—Crayton S. Brooks wishes it announced that he has declined all other calls and has decided to remain in his present field at New London, Mo., where the work of the new century is opening with fine prospects.

—A company of the Boys' Brigade has been organized at the Beulah Christian Church by the pastor, W. A. Moore, with 40 members. Bro. Moore has both experience and zeal in this work. He was formerly brigadier-general of the Boys' Brigade in Iowa.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"The best preparation for colds, coughs, and asthma."
MRS. S. A. WATSON, Temperance Lecturer.

"Pre-eminently the best."
REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

—The Quarterly Rally of the Christian Endeavorers of the St. Louis Christian Churches was held at the Second Christian Church January 28, and a permanent organization effected, with W. D. Cree, secretary of the Christian Publishing Company, as president, Barclay Meador, advertising manager of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, as vice-president, Lee Zider as secretary and Miss Bessie Spicer as treasurer.

—Mr. Joe Coop, son of the late Timothy Coop, of Southport, England, is, as his father was, one of the most liberal contributors to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. He has given more than $10,000 toward the support of our missionaries outside of England and much more than that amount for the work in England. The society and the English churches value his interest not only for the sake of his generous donations in money, but for his wise counsel in matters pertaining to the welfare of the cause.

—At a meeting of the St. Louis Evangelical Alliance on Monday, Jan. 28, steps were taken toward making the Alliance a factor in the purification of city government. A committee of eight was appointed, of which the editor of this paper is a member, representing the leading religious bodies of the city, to nominate a permanent Committee of Public Safety to be composed of fifty substantial and trustworthy business men. There is much legitimate work which such a committee can do without becoming entangled with politics in any objectionable sense or becoming the tool of any party machine. It is worth while to have a trustworthy body of men to examine the records of candidates for city offices and give to the well-meaning or but ill-informed Christian voter the information which he usually has not time to gather for himself. The proximity of the political conventions, which will nominate candidates for our spring election of city officials, makes this step particularly important now. Dr. W. B. Palmore, editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, has taken the lead in this matter and may be expected to see it through to some effective outcome.

—One of our somewhat prominent preachers sent us a few days ago, in criticism of the paragraph on Mrs. Nation, which appeared in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, a scathing denunciation which substituted rhetoric (and very bad rhetoric) for argument and epithets for points. It was returned with the reminder that such language was neither sane nor decent. In reply the said Christian minister, becoming in our opinion a trifle intemperate in his zeal for temperance, remarks, "You are an ass and your paper, so far as it touches on the secular and moral questions, is a poor echo of the anarchistic, lying secular press." This is too bad. There are doubtless many people who think that the editor has hair on his ears when he returns their manuscripts, but most of them are too parliamentary to say so. We are not at all averse to publishing criticisms of ourselves, but we do so only on one of two conditions: They must either be amusing, like the above, or reasonable and calm, like the letter of Bro. Thrapp which is published in another column. We received one other criticism of this paragraph which was argumentative rather than denunciatory, and would have published it gladly had it not been anonymous. As for the quality of our "echo of the anarchistic, etc., secular press," we are gratified that our critic finds it "poor." Naturally. Considering the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as the echo of anything of that sort, it is very poor indeed, wretchedly inaccurate. Why, we differ with it on almost every moral issue. Yes, we must admit that we are a ghastly failure in the role of echo. But then, we never tried to do that sort of thing—and that is some comfort to our friends and ourselves.

HOW TO FIND OUT.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys; if it stains the linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it, or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

WHAT TO DO.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney and bladder remedy, fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes.

You may have a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book that tells more about it, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention that you read this generous offer in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Of Importance to Club Raisers.

The present excellence of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST demands a vast outlay of money for its maintenance and this expense must be met by the amount received from the patrons of the paper.

The present club rates of $1.00 in clubs of twenty-five or more and $1.25 in clubs of ten or more do not furnish any profit to the publishers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

These rates are made to churches which take an interest in the matter of good literature and appoint some person or persons to look after the formation of the clubs without expense or trouble to us.

Even under this arrangement the only possible advantage to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is the addition of many new readers who, after an acquaintance with the helpful qualities of its pages, may decide to become permanent readers at regular subscription rates.

Due notice is therefore given that these exceedingly low club rates are only temporary and will probably be withdrawn after a few weeks. That your church may take full advantage of the present opportunity for securing the very best of Christian journals at the price of the cheapest, your club should be formed and reported within the next thirty days. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

Correspondence.

Open Baptism and Open Communion.

MR. EDITOR: —Will you kindly permit a few thoughts in your valuable paper, from the standpoint of a Baptist? The writer has for a number of years, while objecting to close communion in the Baptist Church, believed the position occupied by your people toward Christians among the unimmersed to be as untenable and as justly open to criticism as that of the Baptists on the communion question.

The Baptists acknowledge pedobaptists to be equally good Christians with themselves, and, therefore fit for the heavenly kingdom. They unite with them in singing the praises of God, in prayer, in preaching the gospel, and in all other acts of religious work and worship, except the sacrament. But when it comes to that one simple act of worship many of our Baptist churches put up the bars and exclude all except Baptists.

So with your people. In the one simple item of formal membership in your local congregations, your people contend earnestly for Christian union—which is praiseworthy—and unite with the pious unimmersed in every act of Christian worship, the sacrament included, and in every good work that has for its object the conversion of the world to Christ. In this manner they acknowledge such persons to be Christians and in the kingdom of God, bearing the fruits of the Holy Ghost as well as themselves, and even heirs of the kingdom above; but when it comes to the one simple matter of a formal reception of such persons into the local congregations, many of your people contend it is unscriptural and not to be thought of for a moment.

Now it seems to me that, if such people are God's children and heirs of glory—and I have shown that your people by their actions toward such people freely admit this—no church or set of men whatever has any right to put up human bars to exclude them from formal membership in the local church. To be consistent, immersionists should either deny that such persons are God's children, or else give them equal rights as such in the local society. So it seems to me from my point of view.

Bravely have your people overcome a number of extreme and even false positions they were almost compelled to assume in the beginning of their movement. And in the not distant future I believe this one will be overcome and that nothing will be made a condition of membership but a loyal purpose to follow Christ according to the measure of knowledge possessed by the candidate. And when this point is reached and your people shall look back at it as a matter of history, they will wonder how they could have been so circumscribed in their views or have held a position so untenable.

This step, when taken by your people, and the abandonment of close communion and the same errors by the Baptists, will prepare the Christian world for Christian union and the acceptance of Bible teaching on the matter of baptism and other important questions as nothing else can. While immersionists continue to hold irrational ground on the matter of church membership and the sacrament, the ears of pedobaptists will remain closed against Scripture teaching on the baptism question. They will continue, as they are now doing, to refuse even to investigate the subject. But once let immersionists show a magnanimous spirit toward pedobaptists on these points, and it will do a thousand times more to break down prejudice and disarm opposition than all the Scripture texts and logic that can be hurled at their devoted heads. A spirit that shows a willingness to bend on account of men's weakness is the spirit of Christ and has in it a wonderful power to win men from error.

From the writer's view-point—and it is not a narrow one by any means—the time is now ripe for just such a movement as is herein indicated, both among your people and the Baptists. There are many people in both denominations who are convinced that it is their Christian duty to receive into their congregations all persons who love our common Lord, irrespective of what their present views may be on the mode of baptism. They believe this course to be eminently scriptural and, therefore, better calculated to subserve the cause of truth than the narrow course now being pursued by immersionists.

TRUTH SEEKER.

[The above letter, admirable in spirit and thoughtful in matter, calls attention to a supposed inconsistency which has often been noted between the willingness on the part of immersionists to admit the Christian character of the pious unimmersed, and their refusal to admit them to church membership. But we are not prepared to admit that the inconsistency is real, or that the time is ripe for even a temporary abandonment of so clear a divine requirement as baptism. What seems to be narrowness, in excluding the unimmersed from full church membership, is in reality liberality. If we narrowly believed that there was no salvation outside of our particular fold, we would be sorely tempted to let down the bars and get everybody in by hook or crook. But realizing that God in his mercy can and doubtless will take care of his faithful servants who have not understood the Lord's requirement of baptism as we understand it, we feel the more reconciled to a course which, while leaving us free to give full recognition to the Christian character of such and to live with them on terms of mutual amity, leaves us free also to set before the world the model of the Christian Church as we believe the Lord intended it to be.—EDITOR.]

Nine Reasons.

The sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes should be prohibited by law.

My reasons for this affirmation are these. The liquor traffic occasions in the United States:

1. One hundred thousand deaths in every year.

2. The direct annual expenditure of one billion two hundred million dollars.

3. The loss of as much more by bad bargains, mismanagement, time wasted, and unnumbered nameless forms of ill thrift.

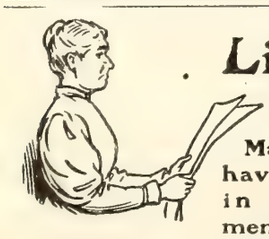
4. More than eighty thousand declared paupers.

5. The cost of above $5,000,000 in taxes annually to support these paupers.

6. A countless multitude of impoverished men, women and children, who are not avowed paupers.

7. At least three-fourths of all the murders, thefts, robberies, breaches of the peace and other crimes and misdemeanors that engage our courts.

8. A heavy addition to our taxes by the acknowledged legal costs of criminal prosecutions, besides far heavier expenses (to parties, witnesses and jurors) of attending courts, and of time lost from their proper employments.



9. And at least six hundred thousand habitual or occasional drunkards.

What right has any government to license men to do wrong?

In the language of Mr. Lucian Minor, in a magnificent address to the people of Virginia in 1853, presenting reasons for abolishing the liquor traffic: "It is the great duty of society to protect itself and the people against wrong and evil, whether coming by violence or fraud, or pernicious and corrupting allurements. This is a chief end—nay, it is the end—for which society and governments are formed. Society, or the state through its legislature, should protect its citizens against whatever threatens their lives, property, morals, peace or happiness. No sane man ever deemed such a protecting law, 'invasive of individual right or freedom,' because no sane man ever deemed freedom to be the right of doing mischief with impunity."

Now, in the light of these undeniable facts, given in the nine reasons assigned for abolishing the liquor traffic, how can a Christian vote for a liquor-licensing political party? Don't talk about other issues. What issue compares with the issue made by the Prohibition party? Financially, all others sink into insignificance. Morally, all others are as nothing.

Little Faith

Many women have little faith in advertisements. Consider PEARLINE. Could it have been advertised so extensively for twenty years if our claims for it were not true? We say it's better, easier, quicker than soap. Saves work and clothes. Try PEARLINE on the faith of the millions who use it. You owe it to yourself to try it. 632

What Motherhood Means

Motherhood means either happiness or misery. There is scant happiness for the mother, who in pain and weakness brings into the world a weakling babe which she can neither nurse nor nourish.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription fits women for motherhood. It strengthens the maternal organism. It tranquilizes the nerves, encourages the appetite and brings refreshing sleep. It makes the birth hour practially painless and gives the mother the nourishment to give her child.

There is no alcohol in "Favorite Prescription," and it is absolutely free from opium, cocaine, and all other narcotics.

"Words cannot express how grateful I am for your kind advice and your 'Favorite Prescription,'" writes Mrs. D. B. Barricks, of Perrows, Campbell Co., Va. "I feel that it has cured me. I had been in poor health for four years. Suffered greatly with my right side, also with bearing-down pains, and my nerves were in a dreadful state. After using four bottles of your 'Favorite Prescription' I am now well. I am the mother of two children. With the first child I suffered twenty-eight hours, and with the second I used your medicine and was sick only three hours. I believe Dr. Pierce's Favorite Presciption to be the best medicine in the world for suffering females. I wish you great success, and hope that God will bless you in your noble work."

Ohio Letter.

Are you a constant reader of the "Easy Chair" in the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST? It is profitable reading. It is helpful. Only last week when sermon making was coming with much difficulty, the Easy Chair was just the thing to give inspiration and suggest the very thing the sermon needed. So, Bro. Garrison, you may be assured that your musings are being passed on and reaching even those who do not know whether there be such a paper as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. May the Easy Chair become more comfortable as the days go by, and continue to give inspiration to your pen.

Ohio has a problem to meet that is very difficult. It is the hardest kind of mission work. Throughout the southern part of the state are scores of churches, many of them strong numerically, but they have no preaching except perhaps the one protracted meeting during the year. These churches are opposed in some instances to organized mission work but many of them are simply indifferent to it. The question is, how are we to enlist them in aggressive missionary work? There are two difficulties in this matter. First, the churches do not want to do anything more than they are doing. Second, the men who will go and work with them and carry on a persistent and effectual campaign of education are very few. W. D. Robinson is doing a heroic work in Meigs county with several of these churches. He went in without any guarantee of compensation. But his work was good, and faithfully done, and new life came to the churches and they are responding and he is being supported. Why is it not as great an honor to revive, educate and enlist such a church in aggressive work as to organize a new church? Why do preachers shrink from it? It is because the people really do not want him. But why should we not put men into these fields and keep them there and support them, so far as necessary, till these churches are saved from death? Do other states have such a problem?

Chillicothe seems to be almost an impregnable field for the Disciples who were first called Christians at Antioch. Several men, good men too, have tried the work there and given it up. J. L. Smith is the last man to surrender. But the sowing of tears may by and by be reaped in joy. We can't always tell just how much good we are doing.

The three churches and two missions of Ohio's capital will hold a union mass meeting at the Central Church on Sunday night, Feb. 10, to make plans and create enthusiasm for the work in that city. Secretary Bartlett will be present and make the address. A committee has been appointed to select, and buy if possible, a lot for a church on the west side by the time of that meeting. The outlook in Columbus is brighter than it has ever been.

W. E. Adams has resigned at Ada and accepted a call to the church at West Mansfield for all time. This is the first time this church has engaged a man for all time. But they are able to do it and Bro. Adams will fit well, so we expect good things from them.

Updike and Webb are stirring up the saints and baptizing the sinners at Canton. The church house has become too small and they have gone to an opera house. That is right. May the time soon come when we can turn all the opera houses into churches.

W. R. Lloyd, of Richmond, Ky., has accepted a call to the Central Church in Youngstown. This, too, would seem like a good fit. He has a fine church and great opportunities for good.

E. S. DeMiller is in a meeting at Fayette this month. Next month he will go over into Canada for a meeting. He is especially fitted to hold evangelistic meetings that will weigh well a year hence. He ought to be kept at it.

By the time this is in print the writer will be in Portland, Me., attending the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the Christian Endeavor movement. He goes as the official representative of the 101,000 Buckeye endeavorers. In the next letter something of this gathering will be told. In the meantime if you have any news of Ohio churches that you would like to have in the Ohio letter, send it as below. C. A. FREER.

A Suggestion to County Secretaries.

This word comes from Bro. D. W. Moore, of Springfield, who is always planning great things for the Master: "We are planning, I mean the district board consisting of two lawyers and two preachers, for each to visit two or three points adjacent to our city and speak in the interest of District and State Missions during the month of March. We are also writing letters to all the pastors in the district asking them to join us in this campaign. Why should not all the county and district officers join us and give the state a thorough canvass?"

Here is a suggestion that is full of promise. Will not each county secretary take it to himself? Some have written me that they would personally visit every church that did not respond to the call some time during the year. But it will be better if we can enlist all the preachers in every county so that the burden of labor will not fall upon one man in each county. In this way every church in the state could be reached. Will not the county secretaries write me their mind about this matter? It is not needful that it be in March, as that might interfere with the Foreign Society, suppose we say April? County secretaries, what do you think of the suggestion? T. A. ABBOTT.

Think Twice.

Loyalty to Christ means liberality toward the work for which he gave his life.

The world needs the gospel, must have it or perish. Christ has commanded us to give the gospel to the world. In his sight the unevangelized heathen will condemn us.

It is no question of others giving much or little or not at all. What wilt thou, Lord, have me to give? Does the offering I make represent my interest in Christ's work? If not, will the Master be pleased with that which does not represent me?

What care we take in selecting presents for friends to secure those worthy of our friends and of ourselves. Would the trifle you intend to throw into the missionary basket have been enough to buy a Christmas present for your friend? But you offer it to Jesus.

Would you put your offering on a tray with your card to be taken into the presence of the enthroned Savior as your offering?

Have you examined carefully your motives for not giving more for the preaching of the gospel to all nations? Do you suspect covetousness may have anything to do with it?

Have you noticed that the New Testament classes this with the most terrible sins and declares that the covetous person shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven? Read carefully Mark 7:21, 22; Rom. 1:29, 30; 1 Cor. 6:10; Eph. 5:6.

The measure of our duty is between ourselves and God, and not our fellow men. The failure of my neighbor to do his duty does not release me. The penuriousness of a fellow Christian must not beget selfishness in my soul. Even the lukewarmness of the pastor is no excuse for my failure. "Thou God seest me." F. W. NORTON.

To Make a Man Toe the Mark.

To take both tobacco and coffee away from a man seems pretty tough, but the doctor ordered me to quit both as my health was very poor, and I had got where I could do but little work.

About a month after quitting I commenced on tobacco again because I could hardly stand it. I got along without the coffee for the reason that I had taken up Postum Food Coffee, which I found very relishing to the appetite, and wonderfully beneficial.

I have gained twenty-five pounds by its use, and to-day I am a well man. I discovered in this way that it was the old fashioned coffee that hurt me and not the tobacco. When I first tried Postum I did not relish it, but found that it was not made right, that is, they did not boil it long enough. Next time it came on the table it was fine and I have been using it ever since.

Mr. Fletcher, an old soldier of this place, was troubled with dyspepsia. I told him of my experience and my cure, and told him to quit coffee and use Postum Food Coffee. This was some time ago. I saw him yesterday and he told me he had not felt better in twenty years, and nothing would induce him to go back from Postum to the use of common coffee. He had the same trouble in getting it made right to start with.

John Ashford, of Dillon, was also troubled with dyspepsia. I told him of my cure by the use of Postum Food Coffee, and warned him to be careful in having the Postum cooked long enough when he did try it. To-day he is perfectly well and his appetite never better.

I could give you the names of a number of others who have been benefited by using Postum Food Coffee. I believe you are a true friend of suffering humanity.—Thomas Sprin Deavertown, Ohio.

Robert Graham.

At a meeting held on the 21st inst., the Faculty of the College of Liberal Arts and the Normal College of Kentucky University unanimously adopted the following expression of the feeling of the Faculty, in view of the recent death of ex-President Robert Graham, which had been prepared by his long-time friend and colleague, Prof. Chas. Louis Loos.

In the death of President Robert Graham, a princely man of the largest and noblest endowments of mind and heart as a Christian, as a minister of the gospel, and as a teacher and guide of youth in the highest spheres of education, and a leader of men of more than ordinary power and of far-reaching influence, has passed from among us.

Long connected with Kentucky University as President, first of the College of Liberal Arts, and for many years after, of the College of the Bible, his enlightened wisdom and singular vigor in administering these important offices, his eminent, scholarly ability, gentlemanly courtesy, and success as a professor in both those colleges, and his deep and active interest always manifested in everything that concerned the life and welfare of the University, have left their impress on the history of this institution which he loved so well. The Faculty of the College of Liberal Arts and of the Normal College recognizes the great debt that the University owes to him, for all that in his long connection with it he has been to it and has done for it.

From his early youth he manifested tireless industry and unremitting patience in the pursuit of knowledge. He was laborious and unwearying in his devotion to duty, ever willing to bear the heaviest burdens.

While we can but feel deeply the loss of such a man, we rejoice that a life of such large usefulness and so rich in its influence for good endured in unbroken vigor of body and mind to a high limit of years that few men reach.

The memory and the influence of the life of President Graham in Kentucky University is to it a rich inheritance that will endure to coming generations.

The Faculty of the College of Liberal Arts and of the Normal College expresses to the aged widow of our deceased brother and to their sons and daughter its sincere sympathy with them in their irreparable loss; and directs that a copy of this tribute be sent to the principal papers of Lexington and of the Christian Church. As an additional mark of respect, class exercises will be suspended during the day of the funeral, which the Faculty will attend in a body.

A GOOD STORY

A certain young lady in delicate health was advised by her doctor to take a half-teaspoonful of Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil after dinner—once a day—and found herself almost suddenly growing robust.

So small a dose is by no means the rule; the rule is whatever the stomach will bear—not more. Another rule is: take it on every least occasion, but not too much; don't overdo it.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

Is Mrs. Nation an Anarchist?

There were many excellent articles in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of the 24th, but with the statements in an article in Current Events I am not in harmony in my thinking. The paragraph is concerning the work of Mrs. Nation, of Kansas, at Wichita. You characterize her work as "anarchy." If the work of Mrs. Nation was anarchy, then she is an anarchist. If this is true, then Christ was guilty of anarchy when he drove out of the temple those who defrauded the people.

Notice the similarity in the two events.

1. The traffic in the temple was contrary to law.

2. The rulers should have enforced the law, but would not.

3. The masses of the people seemed satisfied that the unlawful traffic should continue.

4. Christ did not appeal to the rulers to enforce the law, as he knew they would not; therefore he took a hand himself and broke up the unlawful business. Christ did right, this no man disputes.

How was it in Kansas?

1. The traffic in intoxicants is contrary to law.

2. The rulers of Wichita and other cities will not enforce the law.

3. The masses of the people seem satisfied that the unlawful traffic should continue.

4. Mrs. Nation attempts to drive out the lawbreakers and their illegal business.

If Christ did right, then Mrs. Nation did right.

If Mrs. Nation is an anarchist, would you call Christ an anarchist?

RUSSELL F. THRAPP.

Pittsfield, Ill.

[We gladly publish the above criticism of our paragraph in regard to Mrs. Nation. It is, unlike some other criticisms which we have received, a temperate, gentlemanly and reasonable statement of one view of the case. We call attention, however, to the following facts in regard to Christ's cleansing of the temple, which invalidate the argument drawn from that event:

1. The traffic in the temple was not contrary to law. It was doubtless reprehensible and prejudicial to religion, but that there was any prohibiting statute upon which a prosecution could be based cannot be shown.

2. Since there was no statute the enforcement of which would have prevented the abuses in the temple, Jesus did not insult the law by using individual force to do what should have been done by law, as Mrs. Nation did.

3. Jesus Christ possessed a unique authority which is not shared by Mrs. Nation.

Mrs. Nation's act was of the essence of anarchy because it substituted personal violence for legal procedure in a case where there was a definite statute which should have been applied. The act of Jesus in clearing the temple was not anarchy because he did not do by personal violence anything which the courts could have done under the law. Shortly after, Jesus caused a fig tree to be withered, that he might teach his disciples a lesson, but the act gives us no authority to destroy our neighbor's orchards on any pretext.—EDITOR.]

Encouraging Signs.

There are many things in connection with Foreign Mission work to encourage us.

By a diagram recently sent out, I see that the offerings have increased from $1,706.35 in 1876; $13,117.46 in 1881; $61,727.67 in 1886; $65,365.76 in 1891; $93,867.71 in 1896 to $180,016.16 in 1900. This shows that during the past five years the receipts have been almost doubled, and during the past seven years they have been more than trebled.

Of the 3,067 churches that made offerings for Foreign Missions last year, 37 are in foreign lands.

YOU would like the lamp-chimneys that do not amuse themselves by popping at inconvenient times, wouldn't you?

A chimney ought not to break any more than a tumbler. A tumbler breaks when it tumbles.

Macbeth's "pearl top" and "pearl glass"—they don't break from heat, not one in a hundred; a chimney lasts for years sometimes.

Our "Index" describes all lamps and their proper chimneys. With it you can always order the right size and shape of chimney for any lamp. We mail it FREE to any one who writes for it.

Those who have watched that old diagram of the black and white squares know that there has been an increase year by year in the number of contributing churches and also in the amounts given. In 1876, only 20 churches gave anything to this work. When some of us who consider ourselves yet young in the ministry began to preach there were only 653 contributing churches and only 820 contributing Sunday-schools. Now there are 3,067 churches and 3,260 Sunday-schools. We started with two missionaries and now have 111. We had no native helpers for seven years after the work began, and then had one in 1883, and now have 146. During this quarter of a century missions have been planted in India, China, Japan, Turkey, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, England, Africa, Cuba and the Hawaiian Islands. $1,472,603.85 have been raised and expended for this work. $250,000 have been expended in building chapels, homes, hospitals, schools, etc.

Is there anybody who doubts that our Lord wants this work done? Surely, to this extent we are in line with His purpose; but we must do more. We have only begun. Every man, woman and child who has had anything to do with what has been done has had a blessing.

He waits to see the travail of His soul and will then be satisfied. How long shall we keep Him waiting? He has already waited 1900 years. The twentieth hundred has begun.

I believe that this is to be pre-eminently a missionary century. All modern inventions are to be allies of the gospel. Printing presses are our machine-guns with which to bombard the citadels of error and superstition. Truth goes to the attack now by rail and steam. The railroads, whoever may subsidize them, or whoever may think to own them, belong to God. The railroad proposed from the Cape to Cairo will be a highway of holiness over which our Lord will lead His forces to the conquest of the dark continent.

The world is one world. The best there is in the world is for the whole world, the best plows, the best books, the best laws, why not the best religion? CAREY E. MORGAN.

Ourselves in the Twentieth Century.

BRO. EDITOR:—In your editorial on the Disciples in the New Century (Jan. 17) there is such a pleasing vein of genuine Christian truth that I bid for a line of dilation. You tell us it is one thing to give our adhesion to a fundamental principle of religion and quite another to understand all that is involved in the principle and that logically flows from it.

Now, while I note with pleasure how true this is, yet I see clearly and feel disappointment that when you come to follow it out you allude only to our rejection of creeds and our liberty to organize for missions, etc., against those who want an express "thus saith the Lord." You certainly are very modest and conservative under this great rule of liberty which our noble Campbells propounded. But I think your own heart approves a larger application of the principle than your prudence is ready to avow. You are quite deferential to a class of men among us who do not deserve too much consideration. There are signs among us that we may accept and enter into a much larger liberty.

The phrase "primitive Christianity" and its cognates, such as "the old Jerusalem gospel," etc., are delusive and misleading because they are founded upon Christianity in its earlier stages of development. If we had founded our Christianity on the facts preceding Christ's death or resurrection or the day of Pentecost, what kind of a church should we have? Some of our neighbors have done this in part, such as the Mormons, the Dowieites and others who hold to the mission of "the seventy" and "the twelve" and the working of miracles, and ourselves have been almost as tenacious for elders as a sort of "holy order," forgetting or overlooking the essential truth out of which all these grew and were for their hour and place the provisions for setting forth that truth. We ourselves made the common mistakes of all Protestants. We are Paulites. We follow the Acts of the Apostles as far as to Paul's advent in Rome and say here is the end—we have it; but the Acts of Apostles ends not in Paul's advent in Rome, but Christ's own advent at Patmos.

Our principle adopted with a good grip on common sense will yet work out a great result if we will let go of "holy orders," etc., and accept the fully developed Christianity of the New Testament. Rome founds its infallibility upon words spoken to Peter at a time when Peter was going to oppose Christ's dying by the use of a sword upon the enemy and even resenting Christ's proposal. The best hope I see in our brotherhood is the promise of common sense to overcome what I call nonsense or maybe child sense.

We are in danger of a kind of hypocrisy. We attend other Christian bodies and hold communions with them; in fact our preachers associate with their preachers on equal and fraternal conditions and we do ourselves hold every essential spiritual communion with them and yet debar them from membership on the ground that they have not the true faith on the act of baptism.

We began with a legalistic view of the ordinances and the manner in which we divided between them as to which were church ordinances and which were individual or social is a method I have lost respect for as a piece of specious reasoning without divine substance.

The order of "the seventy" the "feet washing" the "holy kiss" the "love feast," etc., while these are symbols precious as associated with Christ, it is a piece of mischievous ingenuity that can reason us into an open communion, a close baptism, dead feet washing, superseded, obsolete "seventy" and "holy kiss."

The New Testament entirely missed this classification and method of disposing of such matters. In practice we are better than our theory.

It is a scandal against Christ that men will higgle over such matters and then defile their consciences with the works of darkness, will live and do live a time-serving life. All the Protestant sects were born cripples, our own included, but ours had one happy redemption and that was the principle of liberty in Christ which received from us the acute accent but which we were not then able to carry out, nor are yet able, though many of our preachers are nobly trying to do so and I praise them for it and yourself for helping them toward this promised land of a whole, full gospel. The Christ whom I confess is not an anti-creed Christ. His liberty given is not confined to the privelege merely of going ahead with missions, etc. Christ is the Savior and came to save the world. He is not Christ versus anything less than Satan, the devil, and he was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil. That is negative but precedes the saving of the world. He is not even an ordinance-giving or ordinance-defending Christ, but soul-saving, world-redeeming, and the ordinances, so-called, and the provisions and commissions have their values by their associations, by their merits as means to ends and for times, and must ever hold different values with different persons.

But the progress of time brings his authority ever into new power because of its use of living means, for its fresh conveyance and effective operation in subduing of all things to himself through divine grace. It is so much easier for the sinful to load up for glory on ordinances than to feed the living fire upon the heart that issues in divine living in the world day by day.

New Country.

To those of you who are looking for new homes this is especially written. The Comanche, Kiowa, Apache and Wichita Indian reservations are to be opened to white settlement next summer. The law says not later than August 6. I think it will be a month or six weeks earlier. The lands are to be taken under the homestead laws. Anyone who is 21 years old, or the head of a family, who owns less than 160 acres, has not heretofore homesteaded and obtained patent, and who is a citizen of the United States, is entitled to take a claim of 160 acres of this land. The reservations to be opened contain about three and a half million acres, nearly all of which is most excellent farming land. In this country you will find good land, good water and plenty of it, good health and a desirable climate. I have never seen a country where all these elements existed to a greater extent.

A word of warning will be in place here too. There are a number of concerns, located in the various towns along the Rock Island Railroad, that borders this country, calling themselves, "opening agencies," "information bureaus," etc. The government has no agents for these lands nor information bureaus. These concerns are preying upon an unsuspecting public by offering to furnish information, locate you a claim, etc., for which they charge a fee of $2.50 up to as much more as their victim will stand. Leave these concerns alone. They have little or no value to offer you.

If you desire more information write your questions in a brief way, leaving room enough, two or three lines, between the questions, for answers to be written in, and enclose a return envelope and stamp, and I will take pleasure in answering you.

Virginia Notes.

J. O. Shelburne is in a meeting with Bethel congregation in Craig Co. R. W. Lilly is the pastor and we are expecting to hear a good report soon.

W. H. Book finds time to evangelize a good deal. He is now in a meeting with W. J. Wright, Washington, D. C.

Lee Abbott has taken charge of the church at Crewe. Much good can be done in that field and we are looking for Lee to join hands with the Lord and do it.

We had the pleasure of attending the Kanawha Valley, W. Va., district meeting held Jan. 17-20, at Montgomery, W. Va. The following preaching brethren were present: R. S. Fierbaugh, W. N. Harkins, G. W. Ogden, F. M. Covert, A. M. Dial, F. S. McNeely and Bro. Jarrett. The business was conducted in a brotherly Christian spirit and the preaching was good. Good crowds were in attendance and a deep interest manifested. From what I could gather I think our home society would do well to look into this field. It is one continuous town for miles along this valley and the people are crying for the gospel and dying without it. The brethren are consecrated and faithful, willing to do their part. They need help and we should help them as much as possible. F. H. Ollom has been a missionary society in himself and has given as the Lord has prospered him to have the gospel preached in this valley. We need more consecrated wealth in this land of ours.

Much harm has been done the cause by antiism. The people need educating along the line of giving for the preaching of the gospel. They are willing to do all they know how.

Special Dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.
Milton, Ia., Jan. 29.—Fifteen last night; 32 last five days.—HENDRICKSON & RIDENOUR.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:
DAYTON, O., Jan. 28.—Fifty-two yesterday, 41 confessions; 25 last night; 107 in last eight days; 199 to date. Interest intense. Continue this week.—WILSON & HUSTON, evangelists.

Fayetteville, Ark. Jan. 24.—There was one conversion at the First Church on last Sunday.—N. M. RAGLAND.

Jacksonville, Fla., Jan. 21.—We had another addition to the Adams St. Church at our regular morning service yesterday. The new year is opening with us prosperously.—T. H. BLENUS, pastor.

Atlanta, Ga., Jan. 23.—Our work in the First Church under the leadership of Bro. C. P. Williamson has been exceedingly prosperous during the past year. The report shows 620 members on roll, of which 72 have been added during the year, net gain 37; on last Lord's day four were added by letter and two made the good confession.—J. A. JENNER, assistant minister.

Arrowsmith, Ill., Jan. 28.—Bro. S. S. Lappin has been with us in a meeting, resulting in eight being added to the church. I consider Bro. Lappin a very able man in a meeting.—J. F. SMITH, pastor.

Batavia, Ill., Jan. 28.—G. A. Ragan, evangelist, assisting H. L. Atkinson, pastor, just closed a three weeks' meeting resulting in 22 confessions. He will begin a meeting in Ottumwa, Ia., Thursday night.

Bloomington, Ill., Jan. 27.—The Second Church in Bloomington is an assured fact. One hundred and seventy-five have signed for the new church, and to-day they subscribed $8,850 toward the $10,000 we propose to raise. Pastor J. H. Gilliland goes with the new church. We propose to build a $12,000 church, exclusive of the ground. We are happy.—GEO. W. NANCE.

Cameron, Ill.—Two additions Jan. 20 by baptism; 49 since beginning here. C. H. White has held a good meeting at Coldbrook, Ill., for Bro. Spencer, the pastor. Bro. Hughes, pastor at Monmouth, is in a good meeting with his church.—O. D. MAPLE.

Carthage, Ill.—The annual meeting of the Christian Church here was held on Jan. 9. Bro. Stine, of Quincy, Ill., and the writer were invited by Judge Scofield to do the preaching. The occasion was very enjoyable. Truly our people in Carthage know how to entertain right royally. Judge Scofield is widely known as an efficient and successful attorney, and was on the bench for 12 years, and yet he has found time to minister to the church as their pastor for nearly or quite 20 years. He is a man of wide reading and a resourceful mind.—A. L. FERGUSON.

Dorchester, Ill., Jan. 25.—I have returned from Cleveland, O., where I have assisted Bro. Timme for a few days. On Lord's day, Jan. 13, six persons obeyed the Savior in baptism. The work is growing. There are great hindrances to a more perfect success. Many obstacles are in the way. A lot has been bought and enough money has been subscribed to start the second German church. The Home and State Boards are supporting the work. I want an experienced singing evangelist who is willing to assist me in revival work. He must be a single young man possessed with the spirit of Christ, one who makes the salvation of souls the paramount issue and depends on his own enthusiasm, zeal and prudence for that compensation which is the outcome of appreciated labor. Such a young man will find a permanent position and good home.—JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Elma, Wash., Jan. 23.—We have just closed a Bible Institute conducted by Bro. R. E. Dunlap, of Seattle. The teaching from night to night was outlined upon the blackboard. It was lucid, livid and living; and I am sure, in some hearts at least, will abide forever. Two young men recently from the M. E. church are assured that they know "the way of the Lord more perfectly." Also might be mentioned as a result legitimately to be credited to the meeting a family of five from the Presbyterians.—DANIEL TRUNDLE.

Exchange, Ill., Jan. 26.—Closed a 11 days' meeting at Frame Church, nine miles southeast of Fairfield in Wayne county, with 13 additions and the church spiritually renewed. Have been in the evangelistic field since August but desire to locate as pastor.—LEW D. HILL.

Galesburg, Ill., Jan. 25.—I have just closed a few days' meeting at Coldbrook, Ill., with 13 confessions.—C. H. WHITE.

Illiopolis, Ill., Jan. 24.—Bro. S. F. Rogers is in a good meeting here. One by baptism so far. Audiences splendid and preaching fine. Last Lord's day I released the Clear Lake Church from future obligations to me on account of lack of finances. Am ready to hold meetings or serve as pastor churches in Sangamon or adjoining counties.—H. B. EASTERLING.

Jacksonville, Ill., Jan. 27.—"Seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord," characterized an eight-day revival conducted by Pastor Snively; the result was 22 confessions and two by letter. Meeting closed with a packed house.—WALLACE BROCKMAN.

Mill Shoals, Ill., Jan. 21.—Bro. K. A. Williams just closed a very successful meeting at Cisne, Ill., with 20 additions. I assisted him one week, during which there were 10 additions. I began a meeting at the Frame Church, Jan. 16. Meeting six days old and seven additions. Interest continues to grow.—LEW D. HILL.

Rantoul, Ill., Jan. 22.—There were two confessions at our evening service Sunday. Our meeting will begin next Sunday.—HARRY M. BARNETT.

Saybrook, Ill., Jan. 25.—We had 3 additions at our regular service on last Lord's day.—T. A. LINDENMEYER.

Shelbyville, Ill., Jan. 28.—Five more have been added since our meeting closed. Bethany reading class has grown to 35. Go to Tower Hill to begin a meeting to-night.—WM. DRUMMET, pastor.

Sheldon, Ill., Jan. 21.—S. S. McGill has been retained as pastor indefinitely by the church at Sheldon, Ill. There have been five additions already under his ministry, three by confession since the new year. All departments of the work are taking on new life.—W. C. CHAPMAN.

Springfield, Ill.—The annual report of the church at Springfield, Ill., shows $6,825 raised for all purposes during the year; $1,420 of which was for missions; $235 for benevolences. There was an increase of membership of 66. All lines of work are in a flourishing condition. We began a meeting Jan. 27, the pastor being assisted by Rev. J. M. Lowe, of Des Moines. Dr. Willett will be with us in a week's lecture course, beginning Feb. 24.—J. E. LYNN.

Sullivan, Ill., Jan. 28.—One confession here last night.—E. E. CURRY.

Watseka, Ill., Jan. 21.—Have begun my fifth year with this splendid congregation. During the past 12 months I made over 1,000 pastoral calls; received 104 into this congregation; lost 24 by letter and death. The church raised about $2,100; of this amount $400 was for all missionary purposes. Our church quartette made a thousand-mile concert tour, also sang at Fountain Park Assembly. The C. W. B. M. grew from a membership of 35 to over 100. We have now three Endeavor Societies. Two of our boys intend to study for the ministry. The year closed with a genuine surprise given us by the church on New Year's eve. Three added since that time.—B. S. FERRALL, pastor.

Windsor, Ill., Jan. 25.—One addition at Arthur and two at Ash Grove since last report.—A. H. HARRELL.

Anderson, Ind.—We had two additions last Lord's day by letter. The work is moving nicely on. We are looking with anticipation to the union meeting to begin here Feb. 3, conducted by Ostrom and Hillis.—R. B. GIVENS, Minister East Lynn Christian Church.

Waveland, Ind., Jan. 26.—Have closed two weeks' meeting at Alamo, Ind., with eight additions, one by letter and seven by obedience. Church prosperous.—E. E. MOORMAN.

Audubon, Ia., Jan. 23.—The Audubon church is in a splendid meeting with A. B. Moore, evangelist. Eleven added to date. The new house is packed nightly and it is hoped that the church can be made self-sustaining before the meeting closes.—J. H. MCSPARRAN, pastor.

Creston, Ia., Jan. 29.—We have just concluded a good meeting here with home forces, resulting in 28 additions to the church.—W. W. BURKS, pastor.

Des Moines, Ia., Jan. 21.—Twenty-three additions as a result of a twenty days' meeting with home forces at Blockton, Ia. There have been 54 additions since Sept. 1. The church is only two years old and numbers 215 souls. Every department thriving.—H. E. VANHORN.

Des Moines, Ia., Jan. 21.—Closed short meeting at Bondurant Jan. 13, with 13 added. Fine interest and church aroused to action. Whole time engaged where hitherto only half was arranged for. Good outlook for aggressive work.—W. B. CLEMMER, pastor.

Des Moines, Ia., Jan. 22.—We have just closed a meeting of three weeks at Norwalk with 6 additions, 3 who had been members at other places and 3 by confession and baptism.—J. H. RAGAN.

Des Moines, Ia., Jan. 27.—Interest continues; two accessions yesterday and one the week before.—E. W. BRICKERT, pastor East Side Church of Christ.

FREE

A WONDERFUL SHRUB—CURES

KIDNEY AND BLADDER

Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

Rev. A. C. Darling, Minister of the Gospel, under date of May 20th, writes from his home at North Constantia, Oswego County, New York:

I have been troubled with Kidney and kindred diseases for sixteen years, and tried all I could get without relief. Two and a half years ago I was taken with a severe attack of La Grippe, which turned to pneumonia. At that time my Liver, Kidneys, Heart and Urinary Organs all combined in what to me seemed their last attack. My confidence in man and medicine had gone. My hope had vanished, and all that was left me was a dreary life and certain death. At last I heard of Alkavis, and as a last resort I commenced taking it. At that time I was using the vessel as often as sixteen times in one night, without sleep or rest. In a short time, to my astonishment, I could sleep all night as soundly as a baby, which I had not done in sixteen years before. What I know it has done for me I firmly believe it will do for all who will give Alkavis a fair trial. I most gladly recommend Alkavis to all. Sincerely yours, (Rev.) A. C. DARLING.

The venerable Mr. Joseph W. Whitten, of Wolfboro, N. H., at eighty-five years of age, also testifies to the powers of Alkavis in curing severe Kidney and Bladder Disorders, Dropsy and Rheumatism. Hundreds of others give similar testimony. Many ladies also join in testifying to the wonderful curative powers of Alkavis in Kidney and allied diseases, and other troublesome afflictions peculiar to womanhood which cannot with propriety be described here.

That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by mail Free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others. It is a Sure Specific Cure, and cannot fail. Address The Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 401 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Des Moines, Iowa, Jan. 24.—Our meeting in the great Central Church of this city has started with unusual interest. Seventy-three added in first 11 days; 20 on Lord's day. Bro. Breeden has proven himself a major-general in handling these forces and we expect large results for the Master. Prof. F. A. Thomas, who united with the church in one of my first meetings and has since been one of our pastors, has charge of the music.—CHAS. REIGN SCOVILLE.

Grove Center, Ia., Jan. 24.—The writer took charge of the work two years ago, at the same time continuing his studies in Drake. During this period we rebuilt and refurnished the church building at an outlay of $1,100. Five hundred dollars a year was raised for pastor's salary and above $18 a year for missions. This is a poor showing for missions but we will do better in the future as we will not be burdened so heavily with other things. We just closed a three weeks' meeting resulting in 28 additions; 21 of these were from the world, 3 from the denominations, 4 reclaimed. Bro. E. A. Hastings, of Floris, Ia., did the preaching. This is his second meeting for this church. Six years ago while he was pastor at Lenox he assisted in a four weeks' meeting in which 45 were added. The writer has been invited to remain with the church another year with an increase in salary and the privilege of continuing his studies in Drake. We believe that this is a very good showing and that something can be accomplished even by "student preaching."—VICTOR F. JOHNSON.

Keosauqua, Ia., Jan. 16.—Our meeting ended a few days before Christmas. Had 17 additions in all. Used home talent excepting two weeks' help by C. E. Hunt, of Eldon. We have put in about $200 worth of improvements.—CLARK BATEMAN.

Lorimor, Ia., Jan. 18.—Closed a successful meeting here on Jan. 13, Bro. O. E. Hamilton of Des Moines, doing the preaching. Results 14 added, 9 baptisms, 2 by statement, 3 to be baptized. Church greatly strengthened and town shaken as never before. Bro. Hamilton is a talented young man, a student at Drake University. The church has employed him for full time for a few months.—FELIX HENDRICK.

Milton, Iowa, Jan. 25.—Our meeting is doing well; 24 to date. Six confessions last night, one man an ex-representative to the state legislature. We close on Monday evening.—G. A. HENDRICKSON AND V. E. RIDENOUR.

Waterloo, Iowa, Jan. 22. One addition Sunday at the evening service. Work is starting off very encouragingly.—JOE S. RILEY.

Horton, Kan., Jan. 28.—Three added yesterday by letter. The C. E's. reorganized and the work moving off nicely.—L. H. BARNUM, pastor.

Leavenworth, Kan., Jan. 24.—Two made he good confession at prayer-meeting last vening.—S. W. NAY.

Mayview, Kan., Jan. 24.—Five weeks' meeting; 45 added.—J. W. BABCOCK evangelist; J. FULLER, pastor.

Topeka, Kan., Jan. 26.—Closed a four weeks' meeting with the Second, or Central Avenue Church in this city, Jan. 22d, with 22 added; 2 by baptism, two from sectarianism and ight by former relation and renewal of vows. This is a small band of consecrated Christians. It was a strength to me to be with hem.—W. H. SCRIVNER, state evangelist.

Louisville, Ky., Jan. 26.—A young man confessed Christ last Sunday eve. There have been 28 additions since I took this work. The outlook is hopeful. Last night the members gave us a complete surprise by coming in on us. It was my 30th birthday anniversary, and we had a delightful evening. Bro. Powell's annual banquet to business men of the city will be given Jan. 31 in the parlors of the First Church. This banquet is one of the features of the year, and is always looked forward to with much pleasure. A fine program has been arranged for this year, and it is expected to excel any that Bro. Powell has given. The work of the churches in this city is all in splendid condition.—C. H. HILTON.

Barnard, Mo.—F. E. Blanchard is conducting a meeting here with home forces.

Carthage, Mo., Jan. 26.—Despite the grippe, which is in almost every family in the city, our meeting continues with splendid interest. Twenty days and 43 added to the church. W. A. Oldham is pastor here and has been sowing the seed of the kingdom for six years. —HILL & WILLIAMSON.

Carthage, Mo., Jan. 25.—We have just closed an excellent meeting at Jasper with 11 baptized and one from the United Brethren. Bro. W. F. Turner, of Joplin, did the preaching. A new baptistry with heater was put in during the meeting. The Jasper church is growing numerically and spiritually. Bro. Turner has a great and growing work on his hands at Joplin. They will soon have the strongest and best housed church in southwest Missouri. Bro. Ben F. Hill is in the midst of a successful meeting with Bro. Oldham and the Carthage Church. Forty-one added to date. Bro. Hill is now in the evangelistic field and I want to testify to his efficiency. He held two meetings for the church at Mason City, Ia., during my pastorate there. One of these was at a mission point. A self-sustaining church of 130 members, with a $3,000 house of worship and pastor located for full time, his salary provided and all the expenses of the meeting raised on the ground, was the result of a six weeks' meeting in an entirely new field where we had only eight members previous to the meeting. The building enterprise was inaugurated in the meeting by Bro. Hill. He was called to dedicate the house six months later. The planting of that church is the completest piece of evangelistic work that ever came under my observation. Singing Evangelist Guy Williamson is now assisting Bro. Hill. The meeting continues indefinitely.—M. S. JOHNSON.

Hannibal, Mo.—We have had Bro. H. A. Northcutt to assist us in conducting a three weeks' meeting which began Jan. 3d. It would have been a great meeting but for the unusual amount of sickness in the community, including smallpox, which we feared at one time would compel us to close. But the church was greatly strengthened and there were 18 accessions, most of them by confession. This, including a meeting in December at the South Side Union Chapel, makes 35 accessions since December 1. Bro. Northcutt more than met our expectations in his convincing and tender method of presenting the gospel. Hannibal is the home of his childhood and this prophet is not without honor here. It was pleasant to supply for him in Kirksville on Sundays.—LEVI MARSHALL.

Mexico, Mo., Jan. 22.—As already announced, Bro. Dutcher has offered his resignation, which is to take effect the middle of March. We regret exceedingly to lose Bro. Dutcher, for we all love him, and were he to follow his inclinations he would remain with us, for he loves Missouri and the Mexico church, but he feels that there is a larger field for him in the growing west, and that he will be able to accomplish greater things. Then, too, he has a family of boys and girls, growing into manhood and womanhood and he feels that there is a much better opportunity for them in his new chosen field. The year just closed has been the most successful year in the history of the Mexico church. At our annual meeting it was shown that there had been near 100 additions to the church during the year, and that we had raised and disbursed through the different departments of church work nearly $4,000. We have a good man in view whom we shall most likely call.—P. W. HARDING.

Neosho, Mo., Jan. 21.—Five baptisms here last night.—L. C. WILSON.

Palmyra, Mo., Jan. 23.—The church at this place closed a two weeks' meeting last night. There were 16 confessions and two additions by letter. Bro. C. H. Winders, of Columbia, did the preaching most acceptably. Bro. Winders was pastor here for three years and is greatly beloved by the people here.—L. J. MARSHALL, pastor.

Richmond, Mo., Jan. 22.—Have been in a meeting with the Richmond pastor, C. P. Smith, for one week. Eight have been added to the church in that time; seven of them by confession and one by letter. The prospects are good for a good meeting. I find that the pastor here has a warm place in the hearts of his people. He has had this work for one year, and the coming year, if I mistake not, will be a year of great growth and revival of the work in this fine old Missouri town.—H. A. DENTON, pastor at Warrensburg, Mo.

Rocheport, Mo., Jan. 24.—We are in a very good meeting here, with five additions.—ARTHUR N. LINDSEY.

Savannah, Mo., Jan. 21.—We have just closed a short meeting here with six additions. All departments of church work in good condition. January 13th we raised $17.50 for state missions. Bro. Dillard, of St. Louis, was with us yesterday and delivered an able discourse in the morning. We gave him for the "Benevolent Association of the Christian Church" in cash, $30.73, and in good pledges, $45.—A. R. HUNT.

Cozad, Neb., Jan. 23.—Atwood and wife closed here last night. We had a rousing meeting; 29 added. Church dedicated Jan. 13. All bills paid in cash. Our plea is well understood here now and we are greatly strengthened.—A. C. DAVIS.

Hampton, Neb., Jan. 21.—Our meeting here closed last night; immediate results, three by letter. Hampton is a field greatly in need of a careful, consecrated pastor. There is practically no religious opposition to the work here, the Methodists having only one or two families and they are working with us. This is a fertile field and some active worker should enter it. After a few months of earnest, careful work of preparation by a good pastor this field should be ripe and ready for a good and successful meeting. We begin a meeting at Waco, Jan. 22.—R. A. GIVENS.

Sterling, Neb., Jan. 19.—Evangelist A. H. Lemon closed a very excellent meeting here last Sunday; 14 additions. Church work helped in every way.—THOS. A. MAXWELL, pastor.

Asheville, N. C.—I came here last summer and found about 30 resident members of the Christian Church. After preaching in an old library building a while we decided to erect a church edifice. We began work on it the first of October and the building is now completed. It is a beautiful, substantial brick building with rock finish. Will comfortably seat about 300. Is centrally located; probably the best located church building in the city. The members, on the whole, entered heartily on the work and contributed most liberally and all the debt the church owes is $1,000 borrowed from the Church Extension Fund. My work here, while it has been hard, has been pleasant and the memory of it is precious. The few members have been very kind and in Bro. Frank McCrary, the elder, I have had an excellent work-fellow. I am slow to leave this beautiful and cosmopolitan city, but my work elsewhere in the state is calling. But I go without fears as I leave the Asheville Church in better care than my own—B. P. Smith, who has served the Charlottesville, Va., Church acceptably nearly five years. He preached last Sunday.—DANIEL E. MOTLEY.

Hiram, O., Jan. 24.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting at Houland, with eight confessions and one reclaimed.—R. PERRY MCPHERSON.

Neapolis, O., Jan. 22.—Am in a meeting here. Meeting four nights old. Good attendance and fine prospects for success.—E. P. GROW.

Youngstown, O., Jan. 22.—We just closed a two weeks' meeting at Central Christian Church. In spite of grippe and bad weather, the meeting was a success. There were 12 baptisms. W. H. Hanna, of Washington, Penn., was our evangelist.—W. S. GOODE, pastor.

Cottage Grove, Ore., Jan. 22.—We closed a three weeks' meeting here last night with 28 additions; 12 by primary obedience, 3 from the Baptist, one a Baptist preacher, 13 otherwise. F. E. Billington, a Eugene divinity student, is the efficient pastor. This is a noble church and in peace and harmony.—L. F. STEPHENS AND WIFE, Evangelists.

Salem, Ore., Jan. 21.—Two additions last night and one the week before. A number of visiting brethren were present yesterday, members of the Oregon legislature now in session.—P. O. POWELL.

Scranton, Pa., Jan. 21.—Another good day yesterday. Good audiences; five confessions; eight accessions during the "Week of Prayer." —R. W. CLYMER.

Crowell, Tex., Jan. 21.—Have been preaching every Sunday and upon one occasion walked 22 miles to fill an appointment and did that before I ate breakfast. The work is progressing finely in Foard county. We are laying the apostolic teaching before people who never heard it before. Have received an urgent request to visit my old home (Ohio). I would like to say I can fill one or two engagements when in Ohio for revival. Applicants can address me at Lock Box 32, Minerva, Ohio.—GEO. GRIFFITHS.

ELKINS: A College Sketch

By EDGAR DE WITT JONES

The first time I saw Elkins was in 1886 at the fall opening of Central College, a wide-awake school in one of the busy little cities of the great Middle West. He was directly in front of me in the line of students who were being enrolled, and I had a good view of him as he waited his turn. There was nothing in his dress or manners to attract one's attention — indeed, his clothes though scrupulously neat and clean showed much wear and a constant effort to keep them presentable. In height he was a little less than six feet and quite slender. But it was his face that would have directed attention to him anywhere, the most striking feature being his eyes, which were large—unusually large— luminous and of a dark blue. Melancholy eyes they were, dreamy, wonderful eyes. His nose was straight and prominent, mouth not too large and finely shaped, with little curves at the corners that bespoke a sensitive nature. His chin was well defined, the forehead high, over which brown hair, somewhat long, fell—hair that looked a shade auburn in the sun. Add to this his white complexion—a white that at times was almost ghostly—and I have finished his description. He completed his enrollment by signing his name in the register, and passed on. A few minutes later I wrote my name under his, which was written in a neat, almost girlish hand, "Buford W. Elkins."

Later in the day I saw him in the library eagerly scanning a catalogue and taking something down on a bit of paper. The next morning I saw him at chapel, and before the day was done, found we were to be classmates in English, Latin and Mathematics. I was a Sophomore only in English and History, having been but half a Freshman the year before, on account of deficiencies; and Elkins found himself similarly situated. Literature was my favorite study, and I had come out of the Freshman year with distinction in English. It was probably my love of literature that drew Elkins to me. For literature was his delight, and on his entrance into the class I took a back seat, so to speak, and he took the head of the class easily over all. He had not been a week in college before he set the entire student body to talking of his precocious knowledge of books, authors, prose and poetry, together with an accurate understanding of construction, syntax, and all that which goes to make up a good English student.

So Elkins and I became friends, not at once, but gradually. I had known him a month perhaps before he invited me to his room, which was in the pleasant cottage of an elderly couple near the outskirts of town. Elkins had told me that he wanted to be where it was quiet and board was cheap, and that this place suited him in both respects. So one afternoon I went out with him, and on entering his room I was astonished at what I saw. There was no sign of the needless luxury of many of the students' rooms, of course, and I had expected none. The room with its furniture was plain, but its walls were literally lined with books and magazines. Elkins noticed my surprise and his eyes danced with pride as he pointed out volumes of Shakespeare, Milton, Longfellow—in fact, nearly all of the gems of English prose and poetry, in neat cloth binding. I knew now why he wore clothes that were threadbare and denied himself all of those little luxuries that young fellows generally term necessities. He sacrificed all that he might buy books. Before I left he told me his life's story. I learned he was the only child, his father having died when he was very small, leaving the widowed mother to struggle along on a small farm, not the best improved. Both his father and mother had been diligent readers and were people of more than ordinary education. From early childhood Elkins was passionately fond of reading, and by the time he was ten years of age had not only read what books his mother possessed, but those also of their neighbors. By dint of good management his mother made a good living off of the place, and when Elkins grew old enough he worked some on the farm, but he was never strong and help was employed most of the time. He attended the district school, where he made rapid progress in history and reading—progress that astonished both teachers and schoolmates. When he was thirteen his mother sent him to a high school in a town near by, and thus all was going well, and the future looked bright indeed. But ill fortunes came, bad crops came, the farm had to be mortgaged, his mother sickened with that dread disease consumption and finally faded away. The blow crushed the boy, who was sixteen years old at the time, but he strove to rise. He was not strong enough to work at farming nor was his inclination that way. The farm was sold to satisfy the mortgage, Elkins found himself in possession of a few hundred dollars, half a hundred precious books and no near relative within five hundred miles. So he attended the high school for another term, and then, securing a certificate, taught a district school. And since then he had been alternately attending the high school and teaching, until now, when at the age of eighteen he had entered college to learn still more of the authors and books he loved. All this time he told me he lived very economically so that he might increase his number of books.

After this I was always a welcome visitor at Elkins' room. Sometimes he visited me, but he preferred that I should come to his place. He loved his room with its books, where he could remain undisturbed among his treasures. Often I came upon him doing writing that he tried to hide in a modest way. I surmised that it was poetry, and he confessed and showed me other scraps and bits of verse that breathed the breath of genius. I saw to it that others knew this and shortly afterwards he was elected literary editor of our leading college paper. Still, he was shy and retiring and only in me did he confide. His progress in English was simply wonderful. Nothing like it had been done before at Central. But he took little or no interest in mathematics. Often I would see him scribbling something in his tablet as our instructor explained an algebraic problem. Geometry he took no interest in at all and finally dropped it.

There was an annual prize of twenty dollars given for the best essay; contestants being confined to members of the four classes in English. I persuaded Elkins to enter the contest. Afterwards I was almost sorry that I did so. Always a hard worker he worked still harder, and studied early and late. One night I had occasion to pass the cottage where Elkins boarded at a very late hour. All was dark elsewhere, but in his room I saw a bright light burning. The thought came to me that another light was burning, too, and fearful even to think of it, I felt it was burning low; Elkins was working too hard and all of us saw it. He was looking paler and more wan than ever. I took to making him take walks with me on pleasant afternoons. Not being strong a long walk depressed him, yet he always wanted to stroll out to the woods and the calm green fields. I remember one evening in early May we strolled out among the trees, the birds and the flowers, and a look of rest and contentment was on the face of Elkins.

"Elkins," I said, "you love nature, don' you?"

"Ah, yes," he replied, "I can say with Wordsworth:

"'To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.'"

The middle of May came, and with it the time for the essays to be submitted. Elkins had told me his was ready and asked me to come to his room and hear it read before he handed it to the committee. I did so. His subject was: "Poetry the Art of all Arts." I sat listening like one entranced until he had finished, and as he lay back in his chair exhausted, tears rolled down his cheeks, and tears crept down mine, as I grasped his hand.

"Elkins," I said, "you'll win, there can be no doubt of it; and more than that, that essay will make you famous here. My boy! don't you realize there lies before you the prospect of great things in the world of letters?"

The great eyes of Elkins flashed brightly, then they took on a sad melancholy change, his chin trembled, and his white hand shook as he laid it on my knee.

"Such is not for me," he said brokenly. "I feel it in my soul that I am going like mother, only quicker."

I strove to cheer him, but he was resigned to his fate. He was a Christian and death had no terrors for him. Two weeks later the prizes were announced, and as I expected—as we all expected—the essay prize as well as class honors in English went to Elkins. It was as I predicted concerning the essay. It was published and talked of in college and local literary circles. Elkins' name was on every lip about the campus. It was well toward evening when we found each other that day. Elkins had been surrounded by admiring classmates, all eager to congratulate him. He was well-nigh worn out, and I noticed that on his usually white cheeks there burned a hectic flush. He wanted to get away from the noise and clamor and talk with me. So we wended our way again to the green fields and woodland. He was supremely happy and the tone of his voice was more hopeful. Yet when I talked to him of his future work he quoted Shelley, saying:

"'We look before and after,
And sigh for what is not;
Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught;
Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought.'"

Poor boy! as he spoke his voice faltered, and my eyes grew misty. We put our arms about each other and sat down on a fallen tree, and for a time listened to nature's voices. Thus we sat and talked of books, of poems, and of Him who must be in all poetry if it be poetry at all. At last as the sun sank lower and lower we walked back to town. As I left him at the door he turned and said with a sad, sweet smile:

"Old boy, I dislike for you to leave me now. Be with me just as much as you can."

I pressed his hand and promised. The request set me to thinking, and I resolved to change my boarding place, if possible to get a room in the same cottage. Commencement was at hand and I had much to do, but I never forgot Elkins. In a few days the majority of the students would leave for the summer vacation. Not a few would remain for the special classes which continued. Elkins had told me he was going to stay and take a special in Modern Literature under Professor Goldman. So I arranged to stay also, mostly on his account, for I knew the spring of his life was waning. Happily I was able to get a room adjoining Elkins'. Poor fellow, he was happy then, and I also—a strange kind of happiness mingled with sadness.

Commencement was over. The great body of students had gone. I saw as the days passed the slow slipping away of my friend. In love and pity as I watched him, I thought of what Byron makes the "Prisoner of Chillon" say as he saw his gentle brother's life wither away:

"He faded, and so calm and meek,
So softly wan, so sweetly weak,
So tearless, yet so tender—kind,
And not a word of murmur, not
A groan over his untimely lot."

Many were those who sought to assist Elkins in every way. Attempts were made to induce him to go to a health resort at the expense of friends and admirers. But he would not listen to such proposals. He appreciated them, however, as well as the honors that were sent him daily. But he declined their aid just as he had declined honors among the students all the year. To all save me he was the same shy, reserved young fellow that entered "Central" the autumn before. The services of physicians he would not have, saying that there was no use in their trying to cure him; that he wished to stay where he was, write on, read on, till the end came. Before July was half through Elkins was too weak to attend his classes, and I would sit by his bedside for hours at a time talking with him of the subjects nearest his heart. The night of the twenty-fifth, I remember, we were discussing Irving's essay on "Westminster Abbey," and the author's moralizing on the fickleness of fame and the vanity of earthly glory. Elkins remarked that he believed the building of great monuments to departed ones was foolish. "The green grass and what stray blossoms bloom around are memorials enough for me," he said. "You know Gray says:

"'Can storied urn or animated bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?'

"I am going to read the Elegy again tonight," he continued. "Dear Gray, my favorite poet! Dear old Elegy, my favorite poem!"

When I left him it was almost eleven o'clock. He was resting comfortably, his books and papers near him as usual. Tired with watching I feel asleep at once. I slept soundly and sweetly, so that when I awoke it was broad daylight and the sun was an hour high at least. I dressed hurriedly and stepped into Elkins' room. The eastern window shade was halfway up and the glorious sun of the morning fell across his face. But never did I see that face, always wonderful, as beautiful and calm as then. His position was near that when I left him the night before; his shaded lamp still burning dimly. A volume lay at his side, over which his right hand partly lay. The other rested naturally across his breast. A straggling lock of hair hung over his forehead, while a peaceful smile lighted his face radiantly. And yet, I needed not to touch the cold flesh to know that he had gone in the night from the books he loved. Sadly I took from under the pallid hand the volume as it lay open—opened at the Elegy of Gray, and marked in his peculiar fashion at the twenty-second stanza:

"For who to dumb forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing, anxious being e'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing, lingering look behind."

I visited the scenes of my college days last spring and wandered out to the cemetery at the edge of town. It was late on a May day when I found the spot I sought, and there was just wind enough to rustle slightly the branches of the tree that partly shaded the grassy plot, marked only by a simple headstone bearing the name B. W. Elkins. A few late violets bloomed among the blades of grass that quivered in the breeze. I stood, wrapped in the thoughts of other days. The sun sank low 'neath a bank of purple clouds. A meadow lark sang a vesper note to his mate as he flew to rest. And the lines of Gray, his favorite, came to me:

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear;
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air."

The Best Recreation.

Night work does not pay. I have known many successful men who, at the beginning of their careers, worked eighteen hours a day. This may have seemed necessary, but it was not wise, although the persistence and energy which it revealed were admirable.

The most profitable indulgence possible is that given to good, wholesome recreation, which not only improves the quality of one's effort but also extends the time in which to win success, the active period of a man's life. Reading should form a considerable element in a young man's recreation. On this point I can speak with conviction from my own personal experience. I can recall scarcely a day in the course of which I have not spent from one to two hours, or more, reading something substantial—history, poetry, political economy, or historical romance. Not only have I found this one of the rarest pleasures of my life, but it has, to a very considerable extent, made up for the lack of college education. Study in season and out of season. Never stop half-way along any line. Master it, or keep at it until forced to admit it has mastered you. Never forget or overlook an old friend, and make as many new ones as possible without the sacrifice of a whit of self-respect or individuality. Do this from principle, although policy would dictate the same course, inasmuch as it is through our friends that the best opportunities of life come to us.—Saturday Evening Post.

A Story of Edison.

Stories about Thomas A. Edison are almost as numerous as those about Lincoln. One which had not appeared before is given in a recent number of Success, relating the circumstances under which the young inventor found a job in a telegraph office in New York.

A tall young countryman, looking as green as a suit of "butternut" clothes and a slouch hat could make him, applied for work in the Broad St., New York, office of Maury Smith in 1871. Mr. Smith was manager of the consolidated telegraph lines, then in opposition to the Western Union. Like all other managers, he could make room for an expert operator and told the young rustic that an engagement depended altogether upon his skill.

"Try me; I can keep up with the best of 'em," said the stranger.

Mr. Smith noticed that the applicant appeared to be quite deaf; but, out of curiosity, and possibly with the idea of having some fun with him, he gave him a table and told him to "receive" a message then due from Washington.

"You will have to work pretty fast," he warned him, "for our Washington man is in the habit of rushing things."

As a matter of fact, there was no message expected from Washington, nor did the wire lead there. Mr. Smith connected the receiver with a "sender" in another part of the same operating room, and put his fastest operator, "Dick" Hutchinson, at work, sending a 2,000-word message. Edison, for it was he, grasped a pen, and, as soon as the instrument began to click, dashed off the copy in a large, round, legible hand. While deaf to all other sounds, he could catch the faintest metallic click.

On came the message, faster and faster and faster, twenty, thirty, forty words a minute. A crowd of operators gathered around, curiosity and then amazement depicted on their faces. Page after page was reeled off, with never a break, and with the last click of the instrument the forty-minute message had been received perfectly, and lay in a heap of manuscript on the table. The young man's triumph was complete. Hutchinson rushed up and shook hands with him, and Mr. Smith gave him a job on the spot.

An Irishman, who had but recently arrived in this country, applied to a Scotchman for a job. The Scotchman decided to give Pat a trial—also a little advice. "It will be your own fault if you don't get ahead in this country, Pat," said the Scotchman. "Twenty years ago I landed in New York with but one shirt to my back, but since then by my own exertions, I have managed to accumulate a million." "Faith, an' Oi'd loike to be after knowing' phwat any man wants with a million shirts!" exclaimed Pat, "he can't wear more than wan at a toim, begorra!"

"Dis prosperity is all fictitious!" said Meandering Mike.

"What makes yo t'ink it?" asked Plodding Pete.

"Because dey keep on offering' us roast turkey an' cider de same as dey did last November. If we was pergressin' as we ort de handouts would include terrapin an' champagne by dis time."—Washington Star.

Casey's Case.

Law Notes is responsible for the following illustration of the convenient elasticity of a technicality in the right hands:

A Canadian gentleman, named Casey, was appointed to a government place which technically had to be occupied by a lawyer, which Mr. Casey was not. The benchers of the Law Society, however, undertook to obviate the technicality, and appointed one of their number to examine him as to his knowledge of the law.

"Well, Casey," said the examiner, "what do you know about the law, anyway?"

"Well, to tell the truth," said Casey modestly, "I don't know a single thing."

"I have examined Mr. Casey as to his knowledge of the law," the examiner stated in his affidavit, "and to the best of my knowledge and belief he answered all the questions entirely correctly."

She Waited.

Even a Scotchman cannot always be humorous, if he would. Like other people, however, he is sometimes funny without meaning to be. The Scottish American thinks that the message sent by a young man in Peeblesshire to his waiting bride may have kept her from worrying over his non-appearance, but that she must, after all, have received it with mixed feelings.

The bride elect lived in a village some distance from the home of William the bridegroom. The wedding was to be at her home. On the eventful day the young man started for the station, but on the way met the village grocer, who talked so entertainingly that William missed his train.

Naturally he was in what is known as a "state of mind." Something must be done, and done at once. So he sent the following telegram:

"Don't marry till I come. William."

If the bride elect knew her William, she probably knew how he felt when he sent the message, and forgave the mental confusion which resulted in what she must have looked upon as a needless request.—Youth's Companion.

"Was it a bad accident?" "Well, I was knocked speechless, and my wheel was knocked spokeless."

"Which is the head barber?" inquired the customer. "We're all head barbers," replied the artist. "What did you suppose we were,—corn doctors?"

PETE.

IX.—A High Cricket.

Pete had to sleep all alone, for Madge went to bed with Jennie. But first, Pete heard them getting supper. She heard the dishes rattle. However, she was not very hungry. She had eaten three tomatoes, five cucumbers and grapes without number. Then company came, and she heard them laughing in the parlor. It grew dark. Night came and everybody slept, except the little prisoner. It had made her cry to hear the company having such a good time, and when she fell asleep at last, and the moonlight streamed through the window, it showed where the tears had fallen down her cheeks. She looked so little and still, so pathetic and pale and helpless, I know if her mother had seen her, she would have stooped to kiss the quivering lips. Perhaps she would have thought of the years that lay before the little one, and how she must learn the world and the ways of the world, and see real sorrows, and get to be a woman (which Pete was in a great hurry to be). Now at the first break of day, Pete awoke and dressed with a resolute face, only she didn't put on her shoes or stockings. Evidently she had made up her mind what she must do, and she was going to do it. It was more than an hour before her mother's time of rising. Pete felt important; the person who is awake, is monarch of the little world in which all others slumber. She sat down on the floor and tied her two sheets together, and the end of one to the spread, and the spread to the comfort, and the comfort to her jumping-rope, and the jumping-rope to the little iron bedstead, which she pulled up to her window. And she let the sheets and things drop out of the window, thus making a long series of connected bedclothes. And she slid down this improvised rope, and there you have her standing in the yard, with her room-door locked and the house all locked up. She ran to the barn and climbed the ladder, and there lay the tramp, asleep.

"Nap!" she called. He started up with a growl, but discovered the little girl sitting calmly on the hay not very far away (and pretty close to the ladder). "Oh," he said, rubbing his eyes. "Is that Miss Prudence? Well, did you bring them valuables?"

"You don't know what a trouble I had bringing myself," said Pete.

"If you didn't bring no valuables, there was no call to bring yourself," said Nap, who was not very polite.

"Nap, I did what I could. Madge was going to give her things, and I went after Jennie about it, but Jennie told on me, so mamma locked me up in my bed-room so I didn't have a chance to do much, so I tied my bedclothes together and slid out of the window just now and this is all I have; it's my silver bracelet and there are two silver hearts not counting the lock, and here is my ring."

"Reach um over," said Nap, and he took them in his great hairy hand. "Now, Miss Prudence, I ast you if a gentleman of my size could get on this here ring or that there bracelet; and if I could, if I would want to disport um in the eyes of society? They wouldn't sell for nothing, and even if I could sell um, these ernitials on um would block the game. Take um back, Miss Prudence, don't tempt me with um, I begs of you."

"Then you won't go away for them, Nap?"

"Not much! And I'm getting tired of you a-coming up here a-making that continual song to me day after day. I liked 'After the Ball,' first thousand times I heard it, but after that it palled on me. And I got to stay here till your ma can raise that hundred, for I've naturally got to have that hundred and she owes it to me and all I asts is my rights. I tell you right now, Miss Prudence, that once there was a little girl of the name of Elvira, and her payrents taken her and went to live in a haunted house—"

"Now, please Nap, don't begin another of your stories, please don't, they are so interestin', they just throw me all off the track."

"But, Miss Prudence, you've said your say and I'm not going away to nobody's begging and why make a painful interview when I can tell you that—Ever' night they heard strange sounds down in the basement, and at twelve o'clock, midnight, there was a curious 'Thump, thump, thump,' a-booming down the inside-stairs. It come ever' night; but when Elvira's pa took his lamp to see, nothing wasn't visible. And as soon as he went away, 'Thump, thump, thump,' tell his hairs would all rise a-standing, as if they was making something unanimous. One night Elvira said to herself, 'Well, I am going to find out what makes that "Thump, thump, thump!" ' So she put on a black dress so she wouldn't make a light, and slipped out in the hall just before midnight, and scrootched in a corner and waited."

"Oh, Nap, wasn't she afred?"

"Yes, but she just grit and bored it."

"Nap, I've got something I must say to you, and maybe there'll be time to learn what made that awful 'Thump, thump, thump.' But first I want to say that I knew my things wasn't much a-count, at least I was afraid you'd think so, and I wouldn't of come a tall but I had promised and I said to myself 'What will he think?' so I felt like I had to come or you would think I'd broken my word. I didn't know but you might be able to go away without our money, and I just thought I'd leave it to you; but anyway, I'd said I'd come, or I'd never of slid down those bedclothes. That's why I'm bare-footed, I had to cling on by my toes."

"Pray don't mention it," said Nap, waving his arm. "It's very becoming, I'm sure. And as to you offering me them things, I don't take it as no insult, although another man might in my place. But I know your motives are good."

"I'm glad you say that," said Pete, "and I think we understand each other. But now that you have said you can't leave without the money—you are sure you can't, ain't you, Nap?"

"I am just this sure, Miss Prudence; that little Elvira hadn't been scrootched up in the corner but a very few moments when at the head of the stairs she heard something a-going, 'Thump, thump, thump!' 'Oh, I shall die of fright,' whispered little Elvira, talking aside to herself like they does in the theayter."

"I know I would of," said Pete. "But do wait, Nap, till I tell you my second business with you. Since you can't go away, that settles that part. But here's something else. Look!" She drew a tiny black book from her apron pocket. "This is the Bible, Nap. Now I want to read you just one verse. Now I'm going to read; now these words are Bible words, what I say right now: 'But he that believeth not shall be damned.' "

"Well," said Nap gruffly, "What's that got to do with it?"

"I'd think it had something to do with you," said the little girl.

The Army of Health

THE ARMY IN THE PHILIPPINES INSIGNIFICANT COMPARED WITH THIS ONE.

If all people in the United States, Canada and Great Britian who make daily use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets could be assembled together it would make an army that would outnumber our army of one hundred thousand by at least five to one.

Men and women, who are broken down in health, are only a part of the thousands who use this popular preparation, the greater number are people who are in fair health but who know that the way to keep well is to keep the digestion perfect and use Stuart's Tablets as regularly as meal time comes to insure good digestion and proper assimilation of food.

Prevention is always better than cure and disease can find no foothold if the digestion is kept in good working order by the daily use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Mr. Thomas Seale, Mayfield, Calif., says: "Have used and recommended Stuart's Tablets because there is nothing like them to keep the stomach right."

Miss Lelia Dively, 4627 Plummer St., Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "I wish everyone to know how grateful I am for Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I suffered for a long time and did not know what ailed me. I lost flesh right along until one day I noticed an advertisement of these tablets and immediately bought a 50 cent box at the drug store. I am only on the second box and am gaining in flesh and color. I have at last found something that has reached my ailment."

From Mrs. Del. Eldred, Sun Prairie, Wis., "I was taken dizzy very suddenly during the hot weather of the past summer. After ten days of constant dizziness I went to our local physician, who said my liver was torpid and I had overheated my blood; he doctored me for two weeks without much improvement; I finally thought of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets (which I had used long before for various bad feelings) and the first three tablets helped me. They are easily the best all around family medicine I ever used."

The army of people who take Stuart's Tablets are mostly people in fairly good health, and who keep well by taking them regularly after meals. They contain no opiates, cocaine or any cathartic or injurious drugs, simply the natural peptones and digestives which every weak stomach lacks.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists everywhere in United States, Canada and Great Britain.

Parable of the Talents.*

The scene of this parable is probably the same as that of the Ten Virgins, which it immediately follows in Matthew's narrative. Jesus and his disciples were still seated on the western slope of the Mount of Olives, overlooking the city and the temple. The Master had foretold, in words that throbbed with passionate grief, the destruction of the holy sanctuary, and the scattering of the chosen people. He had warned his followers to flee from Jerusalem when the signs of this destruction should appear. He had told them that the time of his own return to the earth was a secret kept in the counsels of the Father, but that they were to hold themselves in watchful readiness, so that his coming might not find them unprepared. The parable of the Virgins emphasized this lesson. Meanwhile, they were not to spend the time in idle waiting, but to busy themselves with the service unto which their Lord had called them, for his most sacred interests were to be committed to their charge, and his work of human redemption to go forward after he left the earth, by means of their faithful ministry. It is to his disciples, therefore, that he speaks the parable of the Talents. The lesson of the Ten Virgins is "Watch, be ready." That of the Talents is "Work, be faithful."

"A man, going into another country," represents our Lord himself, who was soon to depart from earth, and to leave behind him his disciples. The very absence of the master and the uncertainty as to his whereabouts and the time of his return, would test the fidelity of his servants. Few are there who labor as diligently under such circumstances as when under the master's eye. It was a rare compliment paid by Paul to the church in Philippi, when he said, "As ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence." It should be an added incentive to fidelity on our part to remember that our Master, though absent in the flesh, is present in the spirit, beholding all our deeds.

"Called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods." What wonderful confidence Jesus has shown in his disciples, that he entrusts to them the most sacred interests of his kingdom. The gospel itself and all the means for its dissemination, he has given to his people. Time, opportunity, wealth, culture, fellowship, every gift of mind, body, heart, home, society, church and state, is a part of this endowment.

"To every man according to his several ability." Christ is the only absolutely just master who never lays upon a servant's shoulder a burden too heavy for him to bear. If others are gifted beyond me it is a proof that they are able to use more talents than am I. There is something in their disposition, environment or opportunity which affords wider scope for service. Be sure, my brother, that you will have all of time and ability committed to you that you can properly use. Perhaps one reason why Jesus makes the servant with but one talent to be the unfaithful one is because we are more likely to excuse ourselves for not using the more meager gifts. He also wished us to remember that not the neglect of even one talent would be excused. Whatever we have, whether little or much, is ours for service.

"Straightway he that received the five talents went and traded with them and made other five talents." The revised version thus places the word "straightway," making it qualify the work of the servant, rather than the departure of the master. It is a wise servant that goes about his business promptly. Delay in beginning often leads to permanent neglect. The two faithful servants realized the value of time and set to work at once. The result was what always happens. Use gives increase. Capital grows only by investment. Grain must be sown to multiply. Wisdom becomes wiser by exercise. Love finds in loving its increase and reward. The teacher learns as he imparts to the pupil.

"He that received the one talent went and digged in the earth and hid his lord's money." Foolish and wicked way of treating what was given for useful investment. The talent could neither increase itself, nor minister to any want of man, buried in the ground. The world is suffering gigantic loss daily, through the disuse of the buried talents of Christians. Voices that will not sing, or will praise only for money. Wealth that is hoarded, or spent only for selfish indulgence. Sympathy that wastes itself upon the imaginary afflictions of the novel or the stage and is deaf to the cry of dying humanity all about. Oh, brother, sister, dig up that buried talent and put it to work for the Master. It is not enough that you are doing no particular harm. The Lord demands that you be ever doing some particular good.

The reckoning day came at last. The lord of those servants returned and called them to account. So we must all stand before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in the body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. The two faithful servants were approved and granted the same rich reward. "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord." Fidelity to duty, not the measure of our work, is the test. Each had received according to his ability, and had wrought according to the same principle. The reward is the same. Increase of responsibility and power, larger honor and deeper joy become the portion of those who have wrought to the utmost of their ability. They shall share the joy of their lord who have used aright his possessions.

The unfaithful servant excuses himself by pleading his master's hardness and his own fear. Thus do the unfaithful ever seek to throw the blame on the one to whom they owe their solemn duty. "Thou art a hard master," says the criminal to the state. "Thou art a hard master," says the indolent student to the teacher. "Thou art a hard master," says the wayward child to the upright parent. No such complaint is heard from the servants who toiled and gained; only from the one who idled and got nothing. No wonder he feared his master. Love is its own taskmaster. If we love, we will trust and serve. If we fear, we will doubt and shirk. A loved master seems ever a good one. A feared one is counted cruel. The talents were his, not yours, thou unfaithful servant. The true reason for thy conduct is not the cruelty of thy master, but because thou art both wicked and slothful. Neglect is sin. Laziness is a hateful vice. To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin. Thou mightest at least have put my money in the bank, says the master, where it would have drawn interest. Thou hast not only neglected working for my good, but thou hast robbed me of the natural increase of my wealth. And does not every soul that uses not life's powers and opportunities fall under this same condemnation? "Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me, saith the Lord." Let us beware lest such a sin rest upon our souls.

"Take the talent from him and give to him that hath the ten." Yes, he that will not use shall be as though he had not, for what he hath shall be taken from him. And he that faithfully useth shall have more, for he shall enjoy the fruit of his labors and even the failures of the faithless shall bring tribute to his fidelity. He who refuseth to give the best in him to the service of Christ shall become an outcast from the glory and peace of the heavenly kingdom and shall depart into the outer darkness of a hopeless despair. But he who, whether endowed with one talent or many, uses them all diligently for the glory of Christ and the good of men shall enter into the joy of the Lord.

If Christ Should Come To-morrow.

TOPIC FOR FEBRUARY 10.

(1 Thess. 5:1, 2, 4-8.)

The Puritan fathers were once engaged in convention, when suddenly the light failed. Everything became very dark, although it was still only noon-day. Great fear came upon all the assembly. One good old Puritan arose and said:

"Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the day of the Lord has come and that the end of all things is at hand. I move you that we adjourn and betake ourseves to prayer."

"Nay, Mr. Chairman," cried out another sturdy old pioneer, "If the Lord indeed be at hand, he could find us no better employed than in deliberations regarding the welfare of his people. I move you that candles be brought and that we proceed with the business of the meeting."

This is the proper spirit of service to the Lord, is it not? So to live as always to be ready to see him; so to work as always to be conscientiously employed in his service; so to make all employment, sacred and secular alike, redound to his glory. This is the proper spirit for Christians.

If for us the days grow so dark with trouble that we feel the end of our strength is nigh; if disease takes hold of us in such wise as to make us feel we are entering the valley of shadows; if the darkness of temptation descends upon us, it is ours to cry out, "Let candles be brought, and let us set ourselves to our duty."

If the coming of Christ should take place at noon to-morrow, no doubt he could not find a man better employed than in earning his daily bread, in providing for his own, in pushing on his life work, in doing his regular so-called secular duty.

If, however, everybody knew that the Lord's coming should take place to-morrow, most people would forsake their employment and take to hypocritical and frightened prayers; most would, like certain of the Thessalonians, become idle and disputatious, self-righteous, pharisaical, trying to make out in their own minds as good a case for themselves as possible. Undoubtedly it would be a very disastrous thing for the world to know of Christ's coming beforehand. God is very wise in keeping the times and the seasons his own secret.

Are you very sure that the business you are engaged in is fit for the Lord to find you in? Are you very sure that your manner of conducting it is such that you wouldn't mind being surprised in the midst of it? Are you very sure that your conduct is such as would bring no blush to your cheek if you were caught in your acts? Are you very sure that your thoughts are of such a character as befits the high and elevated station of Christian? If so, then go on with business, conduct, thoughts, and let the Lord's coming take place to-morrow or next day. If not, then make the business, the conduct, the thoughts, as near right as you are capable of doing, and say: "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

Obituaries.

GREGORY.

"He giveth His beloved sleep."

Died at his home, five miles south of Mineola, Mo., Richard Fenton Gregory, at the age of 81 years, 3 months, 13 days. He was the son of William Gregory and Nancy Fuqua, his wife, born in Buckingham Co., Va., July 12, 1819, married in Callaway Co., Mo., whither he had removed at early age, to Rachel Oliver, who, with one son and four daughters, remains to mourn his loss. In 1849 he went with an overland train to California, returning in a few years with comfortable means. Few men are builded on a more noble scale, physically and mentally; of fine frame, great strength, energy and perseverance; possessing also the strictest fidelity to honor, truth, justice and virtue. His word was counted good as a bond, and many live to testify to that loyalty in him, so fast disappearing in our time, which when a friend is in need, sticketh closer than a brother. He was quite ready to receive Him who doeth all things well, and now rests "Safe on Jesus' breast." A tender, loving, patient, indulgent husband and father has been called home, and in our hearts there is a yearning for a "touch of a vanished hand and a sound of a voice that is still." Funeral services were conducted by Eld. J. H. Bryan at Antioch Christian Church, of which he had been an honored member many years. For those so sadly bereft, we can ask no better blessing than that his sweet and tender spirit, wise counsels, fidelity to every trust, loyal and faithful devotion, purity of character and loving Christian virtues may be perpetuated in their lives.

"Until the shadows from this earth are cast,
Until He gathers in His sheaves at last,
Until the twilight gloom be over past,
Dear father, may thy rest be sweet"

JONES.

Sarah Watts Jones was born July 5, 1848, in Holmes Co., O. On March 17, 1870, was married to Basil Jones. Her children, eight in number, survive her. In 1883 the family moved to Madison Co., Ia., where they have since resided. She united with the Christian Church in 1872, since which time she has remained an earnest and active member, as are all her children. Her death occurred Jan. 12, 1901, at Mercy Hospital, Des Moines, Ia. The chief characteristics were unswerving fidelity to the right, a strong Christian faith and unselfish devotion to her family, a considerate neighbor, a loving wife, a patient and sacrificing mother. The funeral was conducted by G. E. Roberts, Des Moines, Ia.

STARK.

After a short illness at his home in Warrensburg, Mo., Eld. J. J. Stark, a humble and faithful man of God, passed away. He was born August 8, 1833. He died January 9, 1901. His earth life was 67 years and one day in time. In deeds of service to the Master he lived longer than that. In devotion to his family he was a noble example to all men. A good man has gone ahead to enter the fellowship to us unseen, and, waiting awhile, let us hope, will receive back that family from which he was taken.

When 19 years of age he united with the M. E. Church; and soon became an exhorter. At the age of 26 he entered the fellowship of the Disciples. In the year 1860 he was united in marriage with Miss Eliza Thomas in his native state of Indiana, and in the same year came to Vernon County, Mo. The following year he was ordained to the Christian ministry, and ever since that day has held on high the banner of the cross. For I do not understand that death has deprived him of that work to which he gave himself, not for time but for eternity. The Lord blessed him with three children. The youngest of the three died in boyhood. Two remain to comfort the widow—King and Phil, as we know them here. They are both able and consecrated ministers.

Bro. Stark preached for 40 years in Vernon and adjoining counties of this state, and in portions of Kansas. His home for the most part was in Nevada. From this place his influence went out in every direction. He organized many of the churches in these parts. A few months before his death he moved to Warrensburg and became a member of our local congregation. So soon to him we said farewell! Yes, farewell, but not forever, farewell, but to see thee soon—not in that frail body as a long and patient sufferer—in that fellowship glorified.

H. A. DENTON, pastor.

Warrensburg, Mo.

STEPHENS.

Sarah Elizabeth Stephens, nee Cole, was born June 10, 1861 and died Jan. 17, 1901. She was married to Robert Stephens, April 6, 1877. Of this union four children were born, two of whom and the father survive her. Sister Stephens became a member of the Christian Church in the spring of 1878 and during life thereafter was a faithful and consistent member. The funeral was conducted by A. R. Hunt in the Christian Church at Fillmore, Mo. Interment in the Foultz Cemetery.

SHEM A STORY OF THE CAPTIVITY

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This is the latest work issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The author is already known as a writer of rare power. His books, "King Saul," "In the Days of Jehu," and "The Fear and Dread of Kings" have been favorably received, and have won him an enviable reputation, which will be greatly enhanced by this new volume.

"Shem" is a story which, in plot and sustained interest, ranks with the best modern fiction. It deals with an interesting period of Biblical history—the days of King Zedekiah and the Babylonian invasion, throwing a flood of light on the relation between the Jews and Egypt on the one hand, and the Babylonian Empire on the other. The old story of human love triumphing over obstacles is told in a way to hold the reader's interest to the end.

"Shem" is a volume of 299 pages, neatly printed and bound. Price, FIFTY CTS.

GOSPEL MELODIES

REVISED AND ENLARGED.

First Lines of Some of the Best Songs in this Excellent Book

Praise Him! Praise Him!
I love to steal awhile away.
Delay not, Delay not.
Softly and tenderly.
If God has riches given you.
Oh, I want to be still nearer.
Where the billows roll the highest.
There is a land beyond somewhere.
Oh, would to me were only given.
The Bible reveals a glorious land.
The voice of the Savior says come.
The path is set with many a thorn.
Oh, the love of God to me.
List to the song of the reapers.
Night with ebon pinion.
In the presence of our God we meet again.
Preaching Jesus on the way.
I ask not earthly treasure.
Oh, bless the Lord, Oh my soul.
There'll be room enough in heaven.
I am going to Jesus.
Broad is the road that leads to death.
There is a home, a beautiful home.
Attend young friends while I relate.
Peacefully lay her down to rest.
In thy name, Oh, Lord, assembling.
Toiling for Jesus day by day.
How sweet 'tis to know.
When our earthly life is ended.
Just beyond the shad'wy valley.
The Lord's our Rock, in Him we hide
Far beyond the rolling Jordan.
Lead me gently home, Father.
How firm a foundation.
Go on, you pilgrims.
Oh, how lovely! (Anthem.)
List to the voice of the Savior.
In our Father's home above.
There is one thought that cheers my way.
Make channels for the streams of love.
I've found a friend in Jesus.
It is the hour of prayer.
When storm-clouds arise in the sky.
I wonder if any poor sinner will come.
Oh, the wondrous love of Jesus.
See the ranks of sin approaching.
A thousand lords had gathered in the palace of Belshazzar.
Glory and praise to the Lord who died for me
See! on the cross, the Savior bleeds.
There's a city of light 'mid the stars, we are told.
Just over the river are palaces grand.
Christians, are you growing weary?
There is a rock in a weary land.
O pilgrims, look forward to glory.
When the day is full of gladness.
There is a precious fountain.
Beyond the golden sunset sky.
Do you know a soul that's fainting?
Yes, we have a friend in Jesus.
Come now and let us reason.
When the waves are rolling high.
There is a house not made with hands.
Gone from our home.
I am on my journey to Canaan's happy land.
In thy temple, Lord, we gather.
Christ is knocking at my sad heart.
Let me sing the old song o'er again.
I will tell you an old simple story.
I'll rejoice in the love of Jesus.
There's a beautiful land far beyond the sky.
There's a hand ever ready to lift up all the fallen.
All for Jesus, all for Jesus.
There's a city that is far, far away.
When the trump of God shall sound.
Where are the ones we love fondly?
Teach me thy way.
God of our salvation.
Oh, there is joy in believing.
Praise Him, praise the name of God most high. (Anthem.)
Great is the Lord. (Anthem.)
One sweetly solemn thought.
Make a joyful noise unto the Lord. (Anthem.)
Hear the call to labor for the Lord.
Savior while my heart is tender.
Of the old time I'm thinking.
Twilight is stealing.
At home or away, in the alley or street.
Mother, tell me of the angels.

Book Notes.

In this busy age few people have the time or inclination to read lengthy dessertations on any subject. The present time demands that a treatise on any topic shall be so condensed, "boiled down," that it may be quickly swallowed and digested. We have endeavored to supply this demand in the booklets hereinafter mentioned. Each booklet contains a complete treatment of the subject to which it is devoted, but attention is given to essential and fundamental facts, and not to dry detail. Here is the list:

Christian Science Dissected, A. D. Sector.

Sabbath or Lord's Day, D. R. Dungan.

Frequency of the Lord's Supper, N. J. Aylsworth.

Woman in the Home, State and Church, W. H. Middleton.

Contradictions of Orthodoxy, A. M. Collins.

Letters to Bishop Morris (M. E.), J. M. Mathes.

Life of Alexander Campbell, C. V. Segar.

Experiences with the Liquor Traffic. S. W. Crutcher.

These are all valuable works by able authors. Though they are concise and condensed, do not imagine them mere tracts; they are books, numbering from 64 to 204 pages. The prices are very reasonable. Any book on the list will be sent, postpaid, for 25 cents; any five will be sent, postpaid, for $1.00; the complete set of eight books will be sent, prepaid, on receipt of $1.50.

It gives us much gratification to receive letters like the following. It is a pleasant thing to know that a business enterprise in which you are interested is growing and flourishing, but it is still better when you can feel, at the same time, that through your business you are lending substantial benefit and help to those who need it:

The books ordered from you on the time payment plan duly arrived, and are now lying before me on my table. They are volumes which I had long desired, but had despaired of ever possessing. Laboring for a weak church at a small salary, and with a large family to maintain, I had tried, in vain, to save up enough to buy these volumes. I am very grateful to you for extending to me the time payment privilege. The monthly payments, being in the nature of a debt, I can somehow manage to pay, whereas I could not have laid aside an equal sum each month until I was able to pay cash for the books. There are too many immediate calls on me each month. Again I thank you. May God bless and prosper you!

We are glad to know that we are daily helping others in the same way. Remember that our installment plan may apply to orders for any books published by us (except music books) provided the order amounts to $10.00 or more, and the purchaser is personally well known to us, or can furnish us good reference or endorsement.

By the time this reaches the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, there will be ready for delivery the new volume by W. J. Russell, What is your Life; or, Aims and Aids to Success and Happiness. It is a volume written for and dedicated to "all young men and women who are struggling to attain true development of mind and heart, success in life, and happiness here and beyond"—to quote from the author's preface. Mr. Russell is a pleasing and gifted writer, well known as the author of Wonders of the Sky, a book that has had a wide circulation; we predict that his literary reputation will be much enhanced by this new volume. It is a handsome, cloth-bound volume of 320 pages. Price, $1.00.

At the great yacht race off the Isle of Wight, in 1851, Queen Victoria stood on the deck of the royal yacht, near the goal, awaiting the appearance of the contesting boats. Close beside her stood an officer with a powerful marine glass. At last he cried, "They come, your majesty!" "And which boat leads?" anxiously queried the Queen. "The America, your majesty," was the rather doleful reply. "And which is second?" This time the answer was still more doleful: "Your majesty, there does not seem to be any second!" We are reminded of this little incident—for the historical accuracy of which we cannot vouch—by the marked superiority of The Christian Lesson Commentary over all its rivals. It is easily first among all "helps" for the Sunday-school teacher or advanced pupil, and so easily first that "there does not seem to be any second." At the same time we wish to remark that there are other excellent commentaries on the International lessons. But there is only one book which the great majority of our leading Sunday-school workers enthusiastically endorse as the best, and that is The Christian Lesson Commentary. If you are engaged in Sunday-school work, you should immediately send us one dollar and receive this splendid volume of 429 pages, finely printed and bound and profusely illustrated. Without it your work cannot be so effective as with it.

Two of the ablest, most scholarly writers of our brotherhood have lately gone to their reward—Dr. H. W. Everest and Prof. B. A. Hinsdale. Their visible presence is no longer upon the earth, but they yet continue their labors through the writings they left behind them. Each of these men left several books of such merit that they will be more read and appreciated in a score of years from now than they are to-day. There are very few books that last twenty years, but we confidently believe that such volumes as Everest's Divine Demonstration and Science and Pedagogy of Ethics and Hinsdale's Jesus as a Teacher and Genuineness and Authenticity of the Gospels will not soon be discarded and forgotten. These books are fully described in our General Catalogue, which is sent, free, on application.

There is a perennial nobleness, and even sacredness, in Work. Were he never so benighted, forgetful of his high calling, there is always hope in a man who actually and earnestly works: in Idleness alone is there perpetual despair. The latest Gospel in this world is, Know thy work and do it. "Know thyself:" long enough has that poor "self" of thine tormented thee; thou wilt never get to "know" it, I believe! Think it not thy business, this of knowing thyself; thou art an unknowable individual: know what thou canst work at; and work at it like a Hercules! That will be thy better plan.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events.

Army Bill Passed. After many changes had been introduced by the conference committee in the bill for the reorganization of the army, it was finally passed by both houses of Congress. Several Republicans voted against it on account of changes made by the conference committee. The bill embodies substantially General Miles' idea that the standing army should contain one soldier to every thousand of population. The normal size of the reorganized army will be about 60,000, or slightly less than the ratio stated, but authority is given to the President to increase it to about 98,000 in case of special need. If the bill had failed, our army would have been reduced to 27,000 men when the term of enlistment of most of the soldiers now in the Philippines expires, June 30. The largest proportion of increase is in the artillery and after that in the cavalry, one of the lessons of our late war and of the present South African war being that under present conditions a larger proportion of mounted troops is required than formerly. All amendments to the bill introducing special legislation for the Philippines were rejected, including the clauses prohibiting the importation and sale of liquor. The strongest argument adduced in favor of the bill was the necessity of supporting the troops now in the Philippines and re-enforcing those who will remain when the majority shall return at the end of their term of enlistment. The passage of the bill on this argument means the support of the administration's present policy in the Philippines. It does not necessarily mean the unqualified approval of it, for some congressmen who might be classed as anti-expansionists voted for it as the best thing to do under the circumstances. But this only means that, while they may believe that we have no business in the Philippines, or that we ought never to have gone there, they consider at the same time that it is best for us to stay a while longer, now that we are there. Mr. Spooner suggests that a joint committee of Congress should be sent to the Philippines to study the situation. Probably not a single member of either house, except Mr. Beveridge, has actually been on the ground.

Conditions in the Philippines. The conditions in the Philippine Islands are changing so slowly that there is little or nothing to report from week to week. It takes the progress of at least a month to be visible. The newspaper dispatches and the recent report of Gen. MacArthur indicate that the process of pacification is proceeding slowly. Fighting continues intermittently. There is a gradual diminution of hostile feeling toward the United States in many quarters. But this change of sentiment cannot be expected to be rapid until civil government is established and the rule of the United States begins to bear a more obvious fruitage of advantage to the natives than has been possible as yet. The surrender of Gen. Delgardo two or three weeks ago appears to have ended the insurrection in the province of Iloilo. Thirty captured Filipino leaders have been deported to the Island of Guam. No special hardship is involved in this expatriation except such as necessarily accompanies exile from one's home. It is not intended as punishment but merely to keep the captured leaders from again participating in rebellion. Much criticism has been aroused by the deportation of an editor from Manila who persisted in making attacks upon the government and upon the military administration.

The Work of Congress. Little more than three weeks yet remains for the Fifty-sixth Congress to do its work. There is, as always at the end of a session, a vast amount of work still to be done. The ship subsidy bill now has the right of way in the Senate and would doubtless command a majority in both houses if it could be brought to a vote. The Republican leaders who are in charge of the bill insist on keeping it in the front and the Democrats will not permit a vote so long as any tactics can prevail to cause delay. As the outcome of this situation, it is probable that some of the business of the session will be unfinished when Congress adjourns on March 4. The passage of the Spooner bill, which provides for the more complete establishment of civil government in the Philippines, is urged by the Taft Commission. The members of the commission say that the time is ripe for civil government and that the inauguration of it will do more than anything else toward destroying the feeling of hostility toward the United States which still exists. The war revenue reduction bill has not yet been agreed upon. The Senate introduced many changes in the House bill, including a partial concession to the brewers in the form of a reduction of the tax on beer to $1.50 a barrel. The brewers asked for a reduction to $1 a barrel, the rate which was in force before the war with Spain. It is conceded by all that a reduction of the special taxes imposed to meet the expenses of the war is advisable. The Secretary of the Treasury advised a reduction of thirty million dollars; the House bill made a reduction of forty millions; the Senate bill, fifty millions. In addition to these measures the Cuban constitution, which will probably be completed before the present Congress adjourns, will call for congressional consideration and ought to have it without waiting nearly a year until the next Congress. The present probability is that a special session of Congress will be called to consider these questions.

The Cuban Constitution. The Cuban Constitutional Convention has proceeded with reasonable promptness and also with sufficient deliberation in its momentous task and the constitution is now nearing completion. It is expected that it will be ready to send to Congress in the latter part of the present month. So far no clause has been introduced bearing upon the relation of Cuba to the United States. In fact the relation of the island to our government is something wholly without precedent in our history and it may well puzzle Cuba's amateur law-makers to find a proper expression for the peculiar relation which actually does exist and must continue to exist, without admitting a dependence which neither they nor we desire. Those who speak for the administration assert positively that there is no thought of anything which can be called a protectorate. Cuba is to be free and independent. And yet the fact remains that we gave them their freedom and independence, and are responsible to the world for the way in which they use it. We must see to it that the new Cuban government is better than the old Spanish government in Cuba; if it is not, our action in expelling Spain will be found without justification. Hence, Congress must examine the new Constitution and see if it is such as will afford a basis for good government. It would not, it seems to us, be unfitting for the United States to reserve the right of intervention, not only in matters which affect our own interests, but still more in cases in which it may be necessary to protect the Cuban government against a faction of itself. We actually did intervene in Cuba to protect her against Spain, and it is not impossible that intervention may again be necessary, though it will be less probable if the right is clearly recognized in advance. The recognition of this right in the constitution need not be inconsistent with the independence of Cuba.

Negotiations in China. It is at last announced that the first joint meeting of the representatives of the Powers and the Chinese envoys is to be held on February 5. At this meeting and the sessions which will follow it there will be a thorough discussion of the punishment clause which has been the occasion of so much dispute and objection. The Dowager Empress has recently stated that she cannot punish Tung Fu Hsian, who is known to be one of the responsible leaders in the late outrages, because he is surrounded by an army in the province of Kansu and will doubtless protect himself by force. Li Hung Chang has written a very shrewd note proposing a scheme for raising revenue wherewith to pay the indemnity. His plan is virtually, though not obviously, a tax on foreigners and foreign trade; in other words, a plan to make the foreigners pay their own indemnity.

He also argues shrewdly against that clause of the ministers' note prohibiting the importation of fire-arms. The banditti, he says, will get fire-arms anyway by smuggling and the Chinese troops cannot preserve the peace unless they are armed with similar weapons. Li Hung Chang emphasizes the religious differences as the chief cause of the late troubles and recommends that detailed rules be laid down concerning the relations of Christians and non-Christians. Count von Waldersee has announced the conditions which must be fulfilled before the foreign troops can evacuate Pekin: The Chinese government must show itself willing and able to keep the peace and protect Christians and other foreigners; and it must state a plan satisfactory to the Powers for raising revenue for the indemnity. In the meanwhile 2,000 troops shall be kept in Pekin, 6,000 in the districts of Tien Tsin, Lutai and Taku, and 1,500 at Shan Hai Kwan. This is the first definite and authoritative statement of the conditions which must be met before the foreign troops will be removed.

The Views of the Missionaries. The English and American missionaries in China have united in a note to the ministers, complaining that the demand which they have made upon the Chinese government is insufficient. It touches only commercial interests, provides no indemnity for native Christians who suffered in the recent disorders and contains no sufficient safeguard for the safety of missionaries in the future. The mere statement that foreigners are to be protected is no concession at all, for that was granted theoretically before. What is needed is some measure which will convert this assurance into a guarantee. It is the unanimous opinion of the missionaries, who know the Chinese better than any other class of foreigners, that the whole policy of accepting an indemnity as full satisfaction for the murder of a foreigner—a policy in which we have followed the British custom—is thoroughly unsatisfactory. In no civilized country is a murderer let off with a fine. Yet in China, when a missionary is murdered, his government demands an indemnity and nothing more. The official whose dereliction of duty has made the murder possible squeezes the required amount out of the people and meets the demand. While he is about it, he usually squeezes out more than enough and pockets the difference. The indemnity is paid, the official is enriched and there is no guarantee against repetitions of the offense. What is needed is to make the guilty officials "eat bitterness," as they do not by the payment of an indemnity. It is nonsense to talk of the inconsistency of Christian missionaries clamoring for blood and revenge more savagely than the secular authorities. They are not asking for revenge, but they know the Chinese well enough to know that there can be no protection for foreigners under a system which allows the officials to enrich themselves under the pretense of being punished for anti-foreign outrages.

Public Supervision of Private Schools. The Simmons compulsory education bill, which is now pending before the Missouri Legislature, has a clause requiring that all private schools shall submit to supervision by the school board. It is of course not held that the state can compel a private school to teach certain subjects with a certain degree of efficiency, for the school can go on as it pleases so long as it can secure patronage. But it is held that, if the state has a right to say that all children between (for example) eight and fourteen shall attend school, it also has a right to say what they shall study. The objection of course comes from the Catholics, who are ever ready to interpret the American public school system as an invasion of their peculiar rights. A large meeting of Catholic prelates and laymen has been held in St. Louis to formulate their protest. Nevertheless, this provision of the bill is a very good thing. Without it, the system of compulsory education is liable to nullification by any one who chooses to set up a school. For example: The public schools teach reading, writing, arithmetic and a few other things. Suppose a private school (parochial or otherwise) is established in which the studies for the corresponding grade are the lives of the saints, ecclesiastical embroidery, mediæval Latin and the acts of the Council of Trent. This would not meet the spirit of the requirement that every child between the prescribed ages should attend school. Of course there is no school which has such an absurd curriculum to the exclusion of all the common branches, but there are schools which have some of it and the others need not fear examination. Besides, there are many private schools, Protestant, Catholic and undenominational, in which the quality of instruction is shamefully low. If the state has a right to say that every child shall attend school for a certain number of years, it has also the right to say that this requirement shall not be considered as met except by attendance either at the public schools or at private schools which have been examined and found up to a certain standard in regard to curriculum and quality of instruction.

Legal Status of French Clergy. During the past month the French Chamber of Deputies has been engaged in a series of heated debates on the ever troublesome clerical question. Religious associations have already been regulated by law to such an extent that most of the monastic establishments have been broken up and it seems only a matter of a short time until all those orders, whose members maintain a community life in convents and monasteries, shall be driven out of the country. Even so, the Roman Catholic Church is still established in France to such a degree that large numbers of "secular" clergy, i. e., parish priests, bishops, etc., receive their salaries from the state. While it is not probable that this arrangement will be disturbed for the present, the measure which the Waldeck-Rousseau ministry has been pushing in the Chamber is not less disagreeable to the clerical party. Besides limiting the right of religious associations to hold property, to a degree amounting almost to the confiscation of ecclesiastical property, it provides that no one who has not been educated at the public schools shall be eligible to any office under the government, either civil or military. It would be difficult to conceive of a more fatal blow to the church schools than this would be. The tendency is clearly toward not only a limitation of the property-holding powers of the orders (which now own property officially valued at $215,500,000), but also the disestablishment of the Catholic Church.

The World's Fair of 1903. The World's Fair, in celebration of the centennial of the Louisiana Purchase, now seems an assured thing. The city of St. Louis, in which the fair is to be held, has fulfilled its promise by raising a fund of $5,000,000 by popular subscription and by passing a bill authorizing an issue of bonds by the city to the same amount. These conditions having been complied with, it remains for Congress to make the appropriation of an equal sum and the financial preliminaries will be complete. In spite of the mass of legislation which Congress has to deal with in the remaining three weeks of its present session and the consequent indisposition to admit new measures, it is confidently believed that the appropriation bill will pass. Speaker Henderson has declared himself heartily in favor of it and the general sentiment in both houses of Congress is that the action of St. Louis in raising ten millions shows a degree of enthusiasm which will warrant Congress in appropriating half that sum.

The Marriage of Queen Wilhelmina. It is a striking fact that the passing away of Europe's oldest queen should be almost coincident with the festivities attending the wedding of the youngest, whose present position suggests many points of comparison with that of Queen Victoria sixty years ago. The marriage of Queen Wilhelmina to Duke Henry of Mecklenburg-Schwerin occurs on Feb. 7, and preparations have been made for an elaborate and impressive ceremony. The Duke is an agreeable and virtuous young man and is well liked by the Dutch people, but his financial resources are somewhat limited for the husband of a queen. The discussion of his future title and status and the provision of a suitable income have given to the Parliament occasion for some lively debates. But all has been settled now and Holland is giving itself with singleness of heart to rejoicing in the happiness of the much-loved Queen.

The Queen's Funeral. The funeral rites of the late Queen began on Friday with the removal of the body from Osborne House and ended on Monday with its final interment at Windsor in the Frogmore mausoleum where the Prince Consort was buried forty years ago. The ceremonies throughout were marked more by simplicity than by display, and most of all by the heartfelt grief and sympathy with which the people paid the last honors to their Queen. The naval display between the Isle of Wight and Portsmouth was on a scale seldom if ever equaled, and it is doubtful whether such a number of crowned heads have met together in modern times as met in the funeral procession. The Kings of England, Belgium, Portugal and Greece, and the Emperor of Germany walked together, accompanied by six heirs-apparent and more than that number of reigning dukes and princes. The Queen is buried but not forgotten, and we will turn our eyes now upon the new King to see what manner of man he shall prove himself to be and what will be his influence on the affairs of his kingdom.

Some of the Probable Results.

In a number of preceding articles we have indicated several respects in which the religious reformation which we are pleading is likeyl to develop during the coming century. These may be here summarized briefly as follows:

1. A continued rapid numerical increase because of reasons which we mentioned, placing us in the front ranks of the great religious forces of the world even as to numbers, and greatly increasing our power and influence.

2. Along with this increase in numbers, and contributing to it, an increasing emphasis upon the internal or spiritual side of Christianity, resulting in more thorough conversion to Christ of those who are received to baptism, and a greater care in seeing that candidates for baptism are properly instructed as to its meaning and what is involved in Christian life.

3. A deepening of the spiritual life and a more general cultivation of those Christian graces which beautify and glorify human character, and which do more to win converts perhaps than any other one evangelistic force.

4. A better understanding of some of the fundamental principles of our religious movement, including that of Christian liberty, by a proper understanding of which alone the reformation we plead may be a continuous one, adapting itself to the needs of each successive age.

5. Also a better knowledge of what is involved in our creed-basis, and the advantage that gives us in our plea for Christian union.

6. A clearer distinction between the incidental and transient, and the vital and permanent, in Christianity.

7. A more complete working out of various theological problems from the point of view we occupy as reformers.

8. A more efficient congregational organization for building up the local church, and a more perfect system of co-operation and of supervision by which the weak and shepherdless flocks may be cared for and the ungospeled masses reached.

9. A wiser distribution and utilization of our ministerial force by which the unemployed shall secure places in which to work, the aged ministers places of usefulness, and the young men locations adapted to their needs.

10. Growth in Christian liberality—liberality of thought, of sympathy, of fellowship, within the limit of Christ's teaching and example, putting us in the relation of allies with all who are seeking to build up the kingdom of Christ, rather than that of foes; a liberality also in the use of the means God has given us in pushing forward our missionary, educational and benevolent work, and so honoring Christ with our substance as well as with our minds and hearts.

What would be some of the probable results of the carrying out of these suggested lines of development in our religious movement? We mention a few of these by way of stimulating us to increased efforts in promoting such growth as we have indicated.

Such an example of conformity to the New Testament ideals would have a most salutary effect on all other religious bodies. It would be sure to influence them in the same direction and thus bring about closer sympathy and co-operation between the forces working for righteousness and for the triumph of Christ's kingdom upon earth.

It would hasten that Christian unity for which we have been pleading and praying, and for which the loftiest souls in all ages of a divided Church have been longing and laboring. The moral influence growing out of such a unification of even the Protestant religious bodies would be incalculable. It would give a new impetus to moral and social reforms. Churches which have been wasting their strength in building up their denominational defenses would concentrate their energies and means in carrying forward to triumphant success those reforms which now wait for united action.

Infidelity, materialism, agnosticism would stand condemned and dumbfounded by this modern, moral miracle of a united Protestantism.

The indifferent and worldly-minded Christians would catch the spirit of a new life and of a new power, and would awake to their responsibilities and take their places in the ranks of the active workers.

Christian missions and missionaries would soon girdle the globe and the glad news of salvation through Christ would be preached to every creature in every nation.

If we may do anything to hasten a consummation so desirable and that would be followed by such marvelous results, let us do it with our might, yea in the might of Him whose cause we are seeking to advance and whose reign over men we are seeking to make universal.

By reason of some delay we have only just received number One Thousand of the Christian Commonwealth, London. It is a special Number celebrating that event in enlarged form and containing many illustrations of those who have been associated with the paper during these twenty years and of some of its chief readers. Few papers in the world can certainly claim as many celebrated contributors as the Christian Commonwealth. This issue of the paper contains many notable contributions from eminent men. Many of these compliment the paper for its fidelity to the principles for which it stands and especially Dr. Moore for his unwavering advocacy of primitive Christianity. Some people in this country used to charge Dr. Moore with compromising the principles of the reformation in England. It seems that the people of England have gotten a very different impression of the character of his work. Dr. Joseph Parker speaks of Brother Moore's "unquenchable optimism" and of the personal help he had received from him in his own pessimistic moods, and of the editor's unfailing devotion to "two principles on which his life was founded," and which he seemed to think were "essential to the continuance of the universe." These two principles were "baptism and teetotalism." "These were the binary stars that kept the heavens healthy." This simply means that Brother Moore has been faithful to the baptism practiced by the apostles and to the cause of prohibition. Referring to Alexander Campbell Dr. Parker says: "As a boy I had read Campbell's discussions with no less formidable a combatant than Robert Owen. I have a verbatim report of the elaborate discussions in my possession today. About the intellectual capacity and the debating power of Alexander Campbell there can be no possible doubt. It was the same Campbell that founded the baptism which Dr. Moore so zealously expounds and enforces in his teaching. What a delight it is to meet a man who is thoroughly convinced about anything. Dr. Moore is as convinced a man on the two points in question as any man that ever breathed." It is one thing to stand firm for the principles of the reformation we plead in this country, and quite another to do so in London in the face of such men as Dr. Parker and the venerable prelates of the Established Church, with whom Dr. Moore came in contact. We offer our congratulations to the Christian Commonwealth on the splendid record it has made in the past, and the deep impression it has made on religious thought and life in Great Britain. We trust the paper may have a long and prosperous career and may accomplish much in behalf of pure Christianity and a united church. Paul Moore, son of Dr. W. T. Moore, is the managing editor, who is assisted by W. Durban, our own English correspondent. They both manifest editorial ability of a high order.

How Can This Be?

In his "Autobiography" in The Outlook, Booker T. Washington says of the work at Tuskegee, "The school is strictly undenominational, but it is thoroughly Christian." We wish Mr. Washington would explain to the religious world how this can be. Some of us have been trying to be Christian without being denominational for many years, but we are told by our religious neighbors that this very peculiarity of not wishing to be a denomination makes us a denomination because it separates us from others who are content to be denominationalists. They say that our refusing to wear any denominational title, or to accept any of the creeds, or to make a creed of our own, and our insistence on occupying the broad New Testament basis of fellowship, make us a distinct denomination or sect, because this position constitutes our denominational peculiarity. In other words, they hold it to be impossible for any number of persons, who are unwilling to be identified with any mere denomination, to be simply Christian and nothing more. Their idea is that there can be no such organization now as a simple church of Christ, whose members are Christians only, occupying the same basis of fellowship which the first churches occupied. Some of us have not been convinced of the impossibility of occupying such a catholic position, and we persist in our effort to do so, but not without the charge against us of having started a new sect just like the rest. Perhaps Mr. Washington may be able to explain the difference between denominationalism and Christianity more satisfactorily than we have been able to do, and to point out how the latter is broader than the former, and the possibility therefore of one's being a Christian, without belonging to any denomination, and if one may do so, how any number of persons may do the same.

But suppose the graduates of Mr. Washington's school, having fallen in love with the undenominational type of Christianity which they saw practiced in their alma mater, should prefer that to any existing denominational type, and several of them, happening to be located near each other, should decide to form a local congregation of an undenominational character. Let us suppose that, in the simplicity of their souls, they should decide to call their congregation a church of Christ, and themselves Christians or Disciples of Christ, and to accept the New Testament as their rule of faith and practice. They would no doubt feel that in doing thus they were avoiding denominationalism, and putting themselves in an attitude where they could plead for a closer unity among Christians and be in sympathetic touch with all Christian efforts to bless the world and advance the kingdom of God. But alas! how rude would be their awakening when they found themselves denounced as a new and dangerous sect, unchristianizing all other religious bodies by assuming that they were the only Christians, and virtually claiming superior wisdom over all who had gone before them, by refusing to accept their creeds and to use any of their party shibboleths! In vain would these colored Christians explain that they loved each other, and they could not form as many churches as would represent all the religious denominations to which they had belonged, and they thought it better to form one on a common basis which all could accept; that their action carried with it no denial of the Christian character of others; that they recognized each other as Christians in agreeing to unite; that so far from their action being divisive, it was in harmony with the prayer of Jesus for the unity of his followers; and that in agreeing to wear the names applied to Christ's followers in the New Testament, they were not saying they were the only Christians, but Christians only; and that the New Testament seemed to meet all their wants without the addition of a human creed, and that a creed might divide them, as it had divided others before them. No use! They would be a sect, and, what is worse, a heretical sect, instead of an orthodox sect—until they grew to be large and powerful, and then they would become evangelical, but an evangelical denomination!

Hour of Prayer.

Christian Steadfastness.*

TEXT: "Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord" (1 Cor. 15:58).

It is one thing to get in the right way and another and much more difficult thing to keep therein. It is one thing to look upward and catch a vision of God in Christ and of duty to Him, but it is a very different thing to be obedient to that vision through all the subsequent trials and experiences of life. The grace of steadfastness or perseverance in well-doing is one of the most important and vital to our Christian life which any Christian can cultivate.

Ground of Steadfastness.

The apostle has just concluded a great argument for the resurrection of the dead. He has given his testimony to the resurrection of Christ, and from that fact has drawn the conclusion that all of Christ's followers are to be raised with Him in glory. In view of this tremendous fact, and all that is involved in it, he feels justified in urging the Corinthian Christians to steadfastness: "For as much as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." The reason why our labor is not in vain in the Lord is that the Lord will raise up His followers in the last day and reward them according to their works. Not a prayer offered, not an unselfish act performed, not a sacrifice made, not a trial endured, not a temptation to evil resisted, but is carefully noted by our Lord and Master who promises reward for every worthy act, even to the giving of a cup of cold water in charity. Sometimes we labor for men here and lose our wages, but no man works for the Lord without receiving credit for all that he does and for all that he tries honestly to do. Surely this is solid ground on which to base an exhortation to steadfastness and immovableness in the work of the Lord.

Motive for Steadfastness.

We are reminded by the same apostle in another letter to the Christians that we were at one time alienated from God and enemies in our mind and in our evil works; and now having been reconciled to God through the death of Christ, he desires to present us holy and without blemish and unreprovable before God. But the condition on which this can be done, and we attain to the end for which we have been called, is that we "continue in the faith, grounded and steadfast, and not moved away from the hope of the gospel which we heard, which was preached in all creation under heaven; whereof I Paul was made a minister" (Col. 1:21-23). This work of transforming character takes time, and the believer who is fickle and uncertain in his Christian duties, now in and now out of the way, now present and now absent from the church, now letting his light shine and now hiding it under a bushel, is not one to make progress in Christian life. Such an one must learn to be "not moved away from the hope of the gospel." This hope must hold him steadfast to his Christian duty. Forfeiting his steadfastness he forfeits his hope.

Means of Steadfastness.

One of the common mistakes among Christians is forgetting the relation of means to end and the consequent neglect to use the right means to attain the desired end. If the end in view be so high as the perfecting of Christian character, it is worth while to seek diligently the means by which such end may be gained. There are certain things that must be put on, such as "a heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, long suffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving each other" just as the Lord forgave us. And above all these things we must "put on love which is the bond of perfectness." So will the peace of Christ reign in our hearts. Let no one suppose that he can be steadfast without cultivating the knowledge of Christ and familiarity with His word. "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts unto God." Here is Bible study, church attendance, mutual exhortation, public worship, all given as means of steadfastness. Indeed we must keep company with Christ, imbibe His spirit, so that "whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through Him." (Read Col. 3:12-16.)

The Harvest By and By

One of the most needed exhortations is that which the apostle gives us when he says: "Let us not be weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not" (Gal. 6:9). That is the trouble with us. We get weary in well-doing. We sow and we expect to see the seed springing up at once and, failing to see the results, we begin to wonder whether it is worth while. The soil seems unpromising. The season is unpropitious. There are many obstacles in the way and we ask ourselves whether it pays to continue our labor when there is so little prospect of any outcome. But the admonition is to "faint not" and that in due season we shall reap. We sow now in tears, afterwards we shall reap in joy. This life is the time for sowing. If we do not see the harvest here we shall see it by and by, waving in golden luxuriance before our delighted vision.

Even Unto Death.

How far are we to proceed in our steadfastness to duty, in the face, not only of hardships and privations, but even of perils? The answer is: "Fear not the things which thou art about to suffer. . . . Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee the crown of life" (Rev. 2:10). That is to say, we must proceed in our fidelity to Christ even though it involve our martyrdom. Thousands of faithful Chinese converts during the past few months have submitted to this ordeal and have paid the penalty of their devotion to Christ by yielding up their lives for His sake. No less than 200 of our Christian missionaries and perhaps 40,000 Chinese converts have laid down their lives during the recent uprising in China rather than surrender their faith in Christ. This is one of the most heroic chapters in the history of the Church. If our faith in Christ does not lead us to be willing to lay down our lives for His sake, then we are unworthy to be His disciples. If this should seem to any one to be too great a price to pay for our Christian faith, let him remember what Christ promises in return: resurrection from the dead to the joys of an endless life, conformity to His image and participation with Him in the glory of the life eternal.

Prayer

O Thou who didst lay down Thy life for us that Thou mightest redeem us from sin and from death and make us sharers with Thee in the joys of life everlasting, accept our gratitude for this wondrous manifestation of Thy love and may we have such a realization of our indebtedness to Thee and such an appreciation of what Thou hast promised to do for us in the ages to come, that we may be steadfast and unmovable in our Christian devotion, using every means and facing every peril if so be that we may maintain our loyalty to Thee and receive at last Thy commendation "Well done good and faithful servant." For Thy name's sake, Amen!

Alas! how is it with our hearts that in trouble they cry, and in joy forget! that we think it hard of God not to hear, and when he has answered abundantly, turn away, as if we wanted him no more. George MacDonald.

Editor's Easy Chair.

To-day the heavens are veiled in wintry clouds and the air is full of snow which is fast carpeting the earth and loading the trees and the roofs of the houses with its white treasures. It is a typical winter day, when the life forces of nature seemed held in abeyance by the King of the North. Yonder across the ocean in "our old home," as Hawthorne loved to call England, there is a funeral pageant scarcely equalled in magnificence in the history of the world, carrying the body of the aged and beloved Queen to its last resting place. But no magnificence of funeral ceremony can conceal or obscure the terrible fact of death. All England can say to-day:

"And the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill:
But oh! for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

"Break, break, break,
At the foot of thy crags, O, sea!
But the tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me."

The sympathy felt through all this "Greater Britain," as Gladstone called America, the memorial services that are being held in all our cities, the words of eulogy which are being spoken concerning the aged and honored sovereign, who has exchanged her earthly for a heavenly crown, all tell how strong is the bond of unity that binds the English and American people together. A common language, a common ancestry, a common heritage, a common civilization, a common Christianity, a common mission—these are the strands, stronger than any cable, that bind the two nations together and will make war between them forever impossible. They may have their little disputes and differences, but brothers they will continue to be as they march, side by side and hand in hand, to help the world on to a higher civilization.

Still the snow comes down as if the heavens were intent on covering up all the defects of the earth with its whiteness. It snows to-day just like it did a half century ago as we looked out at it with boyish eyes and with a bounding, boyish heart. It is not strange that our heart turns backward to-day to boyhood and childhood memories, for who does not, on the anniversary of his birth, if on no other day of the year, sympathize with the poet who sings:

"Backward, turn backward, O Time, in your flight, Make me a child again just for to-night."

Not that one would desire to go back and live over all the intervening years, but that for a moment he might experience the feelings and the associations of childhood. Three score years save one! It seems a long time to childhood, but looking back at the years that have passed, what a brief span it is! But short as they appear we cannot deny the changes they have wrought upon us. And when one begins to measure his life by the experiences of joy and sorrow, of hope and disappointment, of triumph and defeat, of success and failure, it stretches itself out into greater length. These are the warp and woof which make up what we call life. It is not simply length of years, but breadth and depth of sympathy, the degree of intensity which we put into our life-work, the results we accomplish, that measure our lives. Jesus died a young man, but His life was long enough to furnish study and inspiration for all the subsequent centuries. Who can measure the heights and the depths of the experiences that were crowded into that brief life? Not how long, but how much, can we live should be our ambition. Methuselah lived nearly a millennium, but Paul lived more than Methuselah.

But when one looks back and begins to measure his life by what he has accomplished, he is likely to feel that his achievements have been very meager and far below what they ought to have been. If he thinks soberly of his own poor attainments, and compares his life with that of some of the great men of history to whom it has been given to accomplish much for human welfare, he can but feel humbler at the result of his comparison. How much time seems to have been wasted! How much energy misdirected! How slow we seem to have been in coming to a clear understanding of the real meaning of life as measured in the light of eternity! But "the Lord knoweth our frame that we are dust." And then we are encouraged in His word to cherish the hope that our poor lives have accomplished good that we know not of. Many a heart has been comforted, perchance, many a wavering soul strengthened to endure the conflict, many a word spoken with voice or pen, perhaps, has been a seed which, finding good soil, has brought forth thirty, sixty and an hundred fold. It may be so! It is pleasing to cherish the hope that the little good which we know that we have accomplished is but a small part of that which the gracious Lord will put to our credit "in that day." No doubt among the surprises which await us in the future world will be the large results which have flowed from little deeds or unforgotten words, and perhaps the comparatively small outcome of greater efforts from which we expected much. Many a so-called failure here will be seen to be a glorious success there. Many a vaunted triumph here will appear over there a mournful defeat. Man's blindness leads him into much fruitless wandering in devious paths; but it may be storing up for him, too, some sweet surprises in the unguessed fruits of little deeds. Our lives are hidden with Christ in God. May it not be that the results of our lives are also hidden there, very largely, to be revealed in the light of eternity?

But these recurring anniversaries, how they remind us of the value of life and the importance of doing what we find to do with our might! The years that have passed by have carried with them many of the illusions of youth. The false promises of pleasure, the deceitfulness of sin, the alluring prizes of the world, including fame, position, wealth and luxury—how fleeting and how unworthy they now appear to be, of human struggle and endeavor, seeing that they endure not, but pass away like the baseless fabric of a dream! But faith, hope and love, these abide and with them God and heaven, with its immortal joys and holy fellowships, also abide. These grow more real as the years go by and as the experiences of life make us wiser and abler to discern between the transient and the eternal. So teach us to number our days, O Lord, as to apply our hearts unto wisdom, and to live for the things that abide!

Questions and Answers.

How ancient is the practice of delivering a sermon in connection with the public worship of the church? The Pew.

The man to whom is attributed the fashion of long sermons is Origen, who flourished in the third century; but it is to be said to his honor that his discourses were devoted mainly to attempts at explaining the Scriptures. After him, several bishops, educated in the schools of the rhetoricians, adapted their discourses to the rules of Grecian eloquence, and this soon became the universal fashion. These finished discourses differed widely from the simple exhortations which seem to have marked the earlier meetings of the Christians.

1. Although marriage seems commanded by Gen. 1:28; 9:1; 35:11, and considered desirable by Prov. 19:4 and others, and honorable by Heb. 13:4, nevertheless is not the inference from 1. Cor. 7, Luke 18:29 and Matt. 19:12, that a person, especially a minister of the gospel, can serve God better if not married?

2. How far is the Old Testament binding now? Is it binding in the commandments mentioned in the foregoing question, or in the marriage of near relatives as prohibited in Lev. 18?

3. Did not the primitive Christians include in their ordination of ministers the laying on of hands? If so, is the method of to-day valid?

4. I know one who thinks that when he made confession and was baptized, he was not truly penitent, though he has tried to live a Christian life. He doubts the validity of his baptism. What is your opinion in regard to it? B.

1. Marriage is sanctioned in the Scriptures quoted and also in the New Testament, rather than commanded. The passages referred to as discouraging marriage are applicable to a special time and circumstances. In times of great persecution, when one imperiled his life by confessing Christ, the outlook was not encouraging for matrimony. Christ sanctioned marriage, and his first miracle was at a marriage feast.

2. It is binding, so far as it has not been superseded by something better, just as a candle was binding until the kerosene lamp was invented, and the latter was binding until gas and electricity took its place. The New Testament is a fuller revelation than the Old, and sheds more light on human duty than the Old, but the latter has its value as history and as presenting a progressive unfolding of God's redemptive purpose. We are under no Mosaic regulations concerning marriage that are not involved in Christ's teaching on the subject.

3. The laying on of hands, so far as we can judge from the record, was a part of the original method of ordination, and so far as we know is now the general practice where formal ordination occurs. It is perhaps not an essential, and was never so regarded, but an impressive method of introduction into an important work.

4. The person to whom you refer is probably abnormally conscientious and may have forgotten the motives that prompted him in confessing Christ and submitting to baptism. We should say that if he is penitent now, and lives a Christian life, he need cherish no fears as to the validity of his baptism.

The Writings of Prof. Hinsdale

By W. J. LHAMON

"The Jewish Christian Church."

Prof Hinsdale's little book entitled, "The Jewish Christian Church," came to me while I was yet in college, and it brought me something of a revelation. As a youthful student of the New Testament I had been entirely uncritical, and had never therefore been impressed with the sharp conflict between the Jewish and Gentile wings of the apostolic church. I had known nothing of the struggle of the young church to free itself from Judaizing influences; I had not appreciated the work of the Apostle Paul's heroic career as the champion of the liberty that is in Christ, and I knew nothing of the influence of this struggle upon the major portion of New Testament literature. The book opened up to me practically a new field of fact and thought and it threw light upon many a chapter of the New Testament, especially in the writings of Paul. It gave to me new views of prophecy, and of Christ's standing in the midst of history as the fulfillment of prophecy, and of law in its relation to prophecy, and of the prophetic element in the Christian Church and the New Testament.

The first part of the book comprises eight chapters under the general caption, "Some Features of Jewish Culture." Here are brief discussions of the "Two Elements in Civilization," of the "Law," the "Priesthood," the "Prophets," "Rabbinism" and "Hellenism."

The two elements in civilization are custom and change, the former answering to legality and the latter to progress or prophecy. Law must come first and under it there must be formed what some one has felicitously called the "cake of custom." But the danger is that a people thus brought under the forms of law will become crystallized there; that instead of making law their servant they become the slaves of it, and fall into a purely hard and fast, and therefore dead and merely legal, mode of existence. In order to progress there must be flexibility. The "cake of custom" must give here and there to allow of growth. One might say in somewhat antithetical style, law must be broken in order to be most serviceable. This is where the prophet steps in, overtopping legalism when it becomes harsh and binding, and declaring for justice rather than technicality, for loftier truths and larger rights, and new realms of freedom. In the interests of progress the prophet may even seem to set the law at defiance, and mount up above it and cry out and spare not, and make declaration of things that are needful whether legal or not. Some of the non-civilized peoples, Prof. Hinsdale tells us, have never taken the first step, while others have never taken the second.

The priesthood was the conservator of the law and under it, had there been no prophetic element, the nation would have grown stagnant indeed. You cannot look to priests for progress. The priest as compared with the prophet is a mere brick in the wall, or a cog in the wheel. He is a passive, one almost says, helpless performer of legal functions. He grinds out the legal, ceremonial grist that comes every day or week or year before him. Beyond that he does not see or care to see. Above it he does not mount. He rather becomes the persecutor of such as would do so.

To prophecy we must turn for progress. The prophet is the poet, the creator, the seer, the "nabi," i. e., the one who sees intuitively and who speaks out of a divine afflatus.

The prophetic office is looked upon as a distinguishing one between such institutions on the one hand as those of Egypt and China and India, and those on the other of the Israelites. Among the former nations no class ever rose with divinely recognized powers superior to those of the priest and the monarch. These nations may have had their Sauls and their Davids and their Hezekiahs, but they had no Samuels, or Nathans or Isaiahs or Jeremiahs. When their kings went wrong there was no rebuking and correcting order of men, and when priests became perfunctory, or fell away into idolatry, there were no greater souls lifting up their voices in terrible protest, and demanding reformation in the name of the most high God.

This study of Prophetism is followed by a discussion of Rabbinism, in which it is shown that by reason of their extreme conservatism the rabbis lost precisely what they attempted to keep, namely the kernel of the law. It was a current saying with them, "Tradition is the check of the law." But gradually tradition grew upon tradition, until the law itself was fenced far away from the people and the nation, and the traditions were esteemed more sacred than the law itself. Many were the rebukes that Jesus gave to these extreme traditionalists for substituting the commandments of men for the law, and thus making the law of no effect. Hellenism, as it is termed, was something of a modification of this extreme rabbinism. It was the play of the Greek spirit, with its beauty and its freedom, upon the cold and fast Jewish spirit after the days of Alexander.

At last, into this mass of legalism, Prophetism, Rabbinism and Hellenism, came Christ, with his message of naturalness, and liberty, and love, and loyalty. He came with his higher revelation of God and with his emancipation of man.

The chapter entitled "Before Pentecost," deals with the life of Jesus among the Jews and their views of the prophecies in relation to the Messiah. The relation of Jews and Gentiles is presented from a Jewish standpoint, and the attitude of the disciples of Jesus just previous to his death and resurrection is emphasized. In chapters that are wholly interesting and valuable the effect of Pentecost upon the Christian mind is considered, and the introduction of the Hellenistic element into the Jerusalem church, and therefore the beginning of the Hebrew-Christian, or Jewish-Gentile, controversy. All this opens the way naturally for chapters on the conversion of Cornelius, the conversion of the Greeks in Antioch, the Council in Jerusalem, the ministry of Paul and last of all the "Catastrophe of the Jewish-Christian Church" is told. The author enlarges upon the destruction of Jerusalem, the foundation of Pella, the final separation of the Palestinian church into a Catholic element and several heretical elements, the absorption of the former into the great and universal Church and the disappearance of the latter from history.

Thoughtfully the author says, in a closing paragraph, "The epitaph of Judaism is the epitaph of Jewish Christianity. 'Your house is left unto you desolate.' The causes of decay in both cases were much the same. Assigning due importance to political facts, the great moral cause was the Levitical tendency. There could be but one Moses, one book of Leviticus, one group of Rabbis. Unfortunately however the Levitical conception of the gospel did not pass away with the Palestinian church. The spirit that turned both Judaism and Jewish Christianity into petrifactions, surviving both Jerusalem and Pella, has continually passed into new forms. It is the presiding genius of Romanism. It haunts many of the sanctuaries of Protestantism. It changes its doctrinal tests from age to age, and proposes new conditions of fellowship; but in itself it changes not. It is the same that it was when it led the great body of the Jews to reject Christ and caused so many of those who did ostensibly accept either to fall back into Judaism or to lapse into heresy. De Pressense is quite right when he says: 'Judeo-Christianity was not so much a simple fact as the embodiment of a principle and a natural tendency of the human heart.'"

Prof. Hinsdale's style is clear, compact and concise. He attempts nothing in the way of florid rhetoric and has scarcely enough of imagination to color his writings for the eye of the popular reader. He holds to the clear, white intellectual light, and holding there he is quite satisfactory to all such as care to hold with him precisely there. Perhaps he would be more widely read if his style were not quite so terse and compact. He has always seemed to me, however, as one of our very best and most helpful writers. He reads widely upon his themes and he is a very skillful borrower, frequently quoting at length from authors who are authorities, or whose statements have great weight. He is eminently a man of the inductive method and of the twentieth century. His convictions rest not upon dogma, or tradition, or a majority count of holy wigs, but upon fact and truth as established by foremost scholarship and most painstaking historical inductions.

"Genuineness of the Gospels."

This leads us to speak of another of his books, the theme of which is "The Genuineness and Authenticity of the Gospels." This is a considerable book and though it was published 28 years ago it has not been outgrown, nor has it lost its value. The quotation from Jean Jacques Rousseau on the title page may well stand for the author's conviction regarding the four histories of Jesus, and also as indicative of the historical method which he everywhere adopts. Here it is: "The history of Socrates, which no one presumes to doubt, is not so well attested as that of Jesus Christ."

The method of the book is to trace the chain of historical testimony regarding the Gospels back step by step to the apostles themselves, and finally, by showing that they are genuine, show that they are authentic. Eusebius, Clement, Tertullian, Irenæus, Theophilus, Tatian, Athenagorus, Claudius, Papias, Justin Martyr, the early translations and the Apostolic Fathers are all brought into this chain of evidence. The author's conclusion is as follows: "I maintain, first, that new Gospels could not have been introduced, or old ones tampered with, in the period from the year 75 to the year 150, without the knowledge of the church and the active co-operation of the ministry; second, that such an attempt could not have been made without the presence of some powerful motive; third, that so far as can be discovered, no such motive was present; fourth, that the attempt would inevitably have been resisted; fifth, that the attempt could not have succeeded without leaving behind ineffaceable traces in ecclesiastical literature."

A remarkably wide range of reasoning is covered by this comparatively small book. The geography and topography of Palestine, the Aramaic form of the New Testament Greek, being precisely what one should expect in the first century, but not in the second; the honesty, simplicity, sobriety and naturalness of the Gospels; their consistency with themselves; the uniquenessss of the character of Christ; and the agreement of the Gospels with the other sources of knowledge—all three have their places in it. His concluding chapter is an unanswerable argument in favor of the following proposition: "The inimitable character of Jesus cannot be accounted for but on the hypothesis that it is drawn from life." This is of the utmost importance to preacher and apologist of this age, for there is no more direct appeal to the minds of men to-day than that of the character of Jesus; and if all other defenses of our faith should fail, this central bulwark of it would yet remain to be taken.

"Jesus as a Teacher."

Prof. Hinsdale's latest book is entitled "Jesus as a Teacher," and is from the press of the Christian Publishing Co. He tells us in his preface that it is in part a reproduction of essays that have appeared at various times in various periodicals, but with careful revisions and important additions. As a teacher he had for a long time been studying teaching methods as illustrated by some of the great masters, including Jesus. At last he was led to make a distinct study of Jesus from a professional point of view. He says, "I found myself at a loss which to admire most, what he taught, or how he taught it."

This is indicative of the author's constant attitude toward Jesus. He is loyal to Christ as Christ. We may not be inclined to agree with him fully on the question of inspiration, and the function of tradition in the formation of the New Testament canon, but his reverence for Jesus is full and unbounded, and his expression of it is as enthusiastic as his style will permit. One is inclined to give lengthy quotations from this book, but must content himself with the exhortation to read it.

The last sixty or seventy pages of it comprise really another work on the theme, "The Making of the New Testament," in which the author maintains his inductive and historical method. After several thoughtful chapters he reaches the conclusion that "the list of New Testament writings—that is, the New Testament canon—was substantially agreed upon as early as the second half of the second century." He says, "To put the thought in another form, fully three-fourths of the writings of the New Testament had then attained a general currency and authority throughout the widely extended Church. In a few cases the Church had not yet made up its mind; a few books were still in doubt; but it cannot be said that, if all the books that were doubtful or disputed were rejected, the historical basis of the Christian religion would be in any way weakened.

By this time, too, the idea of a New Testament, that is, the idea of a complete collection of Christian Scriptures, was clearly defined in the Christian mind. Terms expressive of this idea began to appear. We find the names Novum Instrumentum and Novum Testamentum in Tertullian. Both seem to have been current in his time, the second being, as he says, more commonly used.

Other Works.

With other writings of Prof. Hinsdale I am not familiar. "The Republican Text Book of the Campaign of 1880" I have never read, and probably never will. Such books are ephemeral and unimportant as compared with those we have above considered. After the death of President Garfield Prof. Hinsdale edited his works and wrote a volume entitled, "President Garfield and Education." Altogether he might be termed a voluminous writer.

I do not believe we have any other man among us who has dealt so satisfactorily with the questions of historical criticism. He is thoroughly dispassionate and judicial, and he maintains the tone of a scholar rather than that of a dogmatist or a pugilist, or of one even who has a preconceived opinion. His tone is rather that of a disciple in the school of history and criticism, and of one who really wants to go wherever fact and truth shall lead him.

The Opportunity In Cuba

By Melvin Menges, of Havana, Cuba

For four hundred years Cuba's religious life has been Roman Catholic. Rome dominated Spain, and Spain permitted nothing to interfere with Rome in Cuba. She had full sway, and the same results followed that invariably follow in her unobstructed path.

Public education amounts to practically nothing; gross illiteracy abounds. Moral darkness is everywhere. Personal purity among men, in the city at least, is said to be almost unknown. In consequence the family life is tainted and degraded. Regard for the truth is exceedingly weak. One soon learns from sore experience to place very little reliance on a promise.

In religion the people are nominally Catholic, but faith and devotion are absent. I am told that only the old who expect to die soon go to church. I have not found one in ten who goes to confession. Those who cling to the church do so, not because they love it, but because it is the only guide they know that pretends to give them safe conduct into the world beyond.

These conditions will not always obtain. We are now in the beginning of a revolution greater than has been wrought by force of arms in this fair isle. Into the schools recently established are rushing thousands upon thousands of Cuban boys and girls whose disenthralled minds will be fertile ground for the good seed of the kingdom. We should act, and now, before the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches and the weeds of sin spring up in them.

The greed for money and the indifference to the real welfare of the people have engendered a general repugnance toward priests and what the priests represent. But the religious nature of man cannot be destroyed by the influence of false teachers and preachers. Those who have been among the simple country people say that they listen with delight to the story of the cross, and even here in Havana, where all is distorted and colored by the gay artificiality of city life, there are abundant signs of a longing for a religion that touches the heart and life.

In the meanwhile Rome is at work. She sees that her affairs have reached a critical stage, and she most certainly does not intend to lay down her arms and surrender, but is working with might and main to establish her affairs upon such a new basis as will enable her to win back the affections of the people. A new bishop was sent here some months ago who, in addition to his spiritual duties, has been at work in earnest, trying to secure for the church some millions of dollars worth of property claimed by the government, and the prospects are that he will succeed, thus adding to the power and prestige of the Catholic Church.

From various parts of the island come reports of awakened opposition to Protestantism. Two children about to enter our school were diverted to a church school by the offer of nine dollars a month for privileges usually costing fifty dollars. In Santiago the church school has been made free, and a conveyance has been provided to carry the children to and from it, in order to compete with the Protestant missionaries. Roman Catholicism will never be at a greater disadvantage here than now; and now is the time to strike. The present is opportune; it is critical. Men and money are needed. Bibles should be distributed. Schools should be established. Churches should be erected. Some of the religious bodies are grasping the situation. Brethren, what shall we do about Cuba now?

Evolution at Bartlett's Landing

By BURRIS A. JENKINS

CHAPTER IV.

There was a widow in Clay county whose name was Booth. The circles were dark under her eyes as she sat by the tallow dip, patching a pair of wee small trowsers. Her children, five in all, in ages one, three, five, seven and nine, were scattered helter-skelter about the floor in after-supper play—all except James, poor lad, seven in years, who was kept in the trundle-bed, or partly kept, while the trowsers were mending.

"After-supper play?" Well, not exactly, since there had been no supper that night, and it was rather a hungry game going on upon the puncheon floor. The great fire in the open fireplace blazed high, for there was plenty of wood, at least; and the snow, drifted against the cracks of the ill-fitting window and door, made things all the warmer.

This same snow also deadened the sound of hoofs and boots, so that the widow started with alarm when a strong hand thumped at the door. The oldest boy leaped to the squirrel-gun, for all was not lawful in Missouri in those early days. The widow cautiously set the door ajar, then instantly threw it wide.

"Law's a'mercy, Elder Winfield! What possessed ye to be ridin' out sech a night? Somebody in trouble sommers?"

"Not unless you are, Sister Booth."

Many a time shelter had been denied him in time of storm as a Campbellite heretic, but never in a needy widow's home.

"Ugh, but it's cold," he continued, as he stood, back toward the fire. "All well?"

"Yes, thank ye, fair to middlin'. It's real wonderful how little cold the children catch this winter. Ben and Alice and Mary's the only ones that's got colds now, and they're perkin' up right smart sence yestiddy."

And indeed they did look rosy and strong for a straitened widow's flock.

"Got enough cough syrup for 'em?" asked Henry.

"O la, yes, thank ye."

Perhaps it was the word syrup; but something at any rate, struck a responsive chord somewhere in the three-year-old, for the little thing whined:

"Maw, gimme bread, butter and 'lasses, maw!"

"Hush, Alice," and the widow sought hurriedly to suppress the tow-head's longings.

"You keep middlin' well, do ye, Brother Winfield?"

Henry made no reply, as he gazed about for tokens of the evening meal; but his broad shoulders and ruddy face made answer enough.

The child pleaded yet more for "bread, butter and 'lasses, maw." The little thing knew full well that the big preacher's presence meant things to eat.

"Look here, widow," said Henry sternly, "hasn't the child had supper?"

Mrs. Booth seemed frightened at his tone, and said: "Elder, I did my best to make it last—"

"O, that's not it, Sister Booth; I was only impatient with myself for staying two weeks away at the meeting at Wild Cat Creek. Hasn't your stranger friend been here?"

"No, sir. The snow's been so deep, and he's—" She stopped abruptly.

"Who is he, anyway?"

But he had often asked the same question before, and now, knowing he would get no answer, made for the door.

"I'll bring in the sack—why bless me, if I haven't left the basket, too, out in the snow."

Soon there was supper in that fatherless and needy home; and bread and butter and molasses in that baby girl's hands.

Henry remained but a short time, then mounted for his sixteen-mile ride to Wild Cat Creek.

Hardly had he gone when another strong rap came at the widow's door. She started from her stool by the table saying: "Elder must a' forgot somethin'," and hastened to unbar the door.

"Why, sakes alive, Elder Bartlett! Come right in! Who'd 'a' looked for you sech a night?"

"Well, Sarah," replied the old elder, stamping the snow off near the door, "I've left you longer than I ought a'ready; and it seemed as if this snow would never stop. But you seem to have plenty."

"Yes—I—that is—Eld—" hesitated the widow.

"Ah, it's your other friend. I could just see him in the dark riding down to the covered bridge. Looks strong and young and—" with a tone of suspicion, "maybe handsome."

"Elder!" the widow's voice was full, partly of anger, but mostly of grief, and tears started into her eyes.

"Forgive me, Sarah! I've known you from a child. I ought never to think a breath of wrong of you—nor do I neither."

"If it wa'n't for my promise," she said eagerly, "I'd tell you who he is, and I believe I will anyway—"

"No, no, you are right. Don't break your word, Sarah."

"You know you made me promise not to tell anybody that you come, either; and he's jest like you in that. He jest dreads to let his right hand know—"

"That's the wrong interpretation of that text," interrupted the elder; "but no matter. You haven't broke your promise to me, either, have you?"

"No, nor I won't."

And so the Widow Booth knew no more want that season.

The slow, white months of winter passed away. Once more the wheat began to peep green from the bursting ground; crocuses showed their stalks, yellowish-whitish-green, by the limestone walk at Bartlett's. Violets even had Jane found in the damp corner near the spring, and daily she scanned the pansy-boxes outside her chamber window. Robins were leaping every morning on the young grass in the apple orchard; and meadow larks, fat as quails, perching on stake-and-ridered fences, turned their yellow breasts to the sun and fluted out their spring love-songs.

Well-nigh a year had gone and the lovers seemed scarce so close together as when, four years ago, a thousand miles of wood and prairie rolled between. In that year Henry toiled faithfully in his church in the village of Liberty. All laymen's hearts had been won to him; and even in gatherings of ministers, where most of his colleagues disowned his views and declaimed against him, his quiet dignity and imperturbable good humor had won him friends. Luckily his church was independent in government, and a trial for heresy was impossible. Some there were who would have burned him at the stake had they the power; but there was no formulated statement of faith by which to test him, no legislative body to pass upon him. So long as he kept the loyalty of his own congregation there was no recourse against him. He continued to speak fearlessly, and gradually to leaven the lump, especially as regards the younger ministers, to his own way of thinking.

Elder Bartlett had shunned all personal contact with the younger man. Not that he feared controversy or doubted his own position; but that his love for the youth was unaltered and his heart-strings would not bear the strain of contest. Indeed, as time went on, and the evidence of Henry's good influence upon men's lives became known, Jane's hopes had begun feebly to dawn again. She noted that her father listened not only patiently, but, she thought, even eagerly, to praises of the young preacher. The elder himself never spoke of Henry.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

English Topics.

Initial Melancholia.

The British people are not at this crisis in their most cheerful national mood. The war drags on miserably. The preachers who have been addressing great audiences at new year have for the most part been uttering jeremiads over the past and future alike, simply because all things are not entirely roseate at this juncture. And yet, what after all is the matter with us? We have been in worse plight many a time before. For instance, at the beginning of the 19th century England was struggling for her very life. She was fighting Apollyon in the shape of Napoleon, and but for her fearful and passionate and prolonged efforts these British Isles would have fallen into slavery under the French flag. All the continent lay in a swoon under the heel of the grim little Corsican. Bread and flour were exactly four times as dear as they are at this moment. The population of England and Wales was only eleven millions. And yet our little nation defeated France, conquered India, colonized South Africa and Australia and New Zealand, and early in the century after the great French war was over began a career of prosperity which boomed by leaps and bounds and is now growing brighter than ever. Britain's greatness is not declining. If any croakers talk of the commencing decadence of England, tell them they are articulating twaddle. England is being dwarfed by her mighty colonies. That is all. That must be. These islands of the United Kingdom form but a tiny fraction of the mightiest empire the world has ever seen or ever can see. No man yet dreams of the majesty and might which will be the characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race. America will accompany the British empire in its rise. It will at times seem to eclipse it. There will be alternations and oscillations. But before the 20th century is half gone the rest of the world, with its appalling despotisms, its gigantic militarisms and its crushing conscriptions, will be face to face with the confederation of the whole Anglo-Saxon race, which is the only absolute certainty of the near future about which it is safe to prophesy.

What Must Surely Happen.

I think very much about my own country and America in relation to each other. I am painfully aware that certain sections of the American nation owe no good feeling to us poor Britishers. But I have continually noticed that the vivacity and keen acumen of the American people mislead them into judgments far too hasty. Their very genius precipitates them into quick fallacies. The British people are all well-wishers of America, for they quietly study and strive to understand the American difficulties and problems. For instance, we do not ridicule or condemn all Americans because of the Tammany monstrosity, which I for myself saw to be an unspeakable disgrace. There are reasons for the existence for the time of anomalies in each country, and there is not even an approximation to perfection in either. Each nation might in a thousand ways help the other. Hard criticism of England springs from ignorance of ancient causes, or from inability to appreciate our peculiar difficulties. One thing I make bold to say. The Americans will not be able to help themselves. Their destiny is to grow immeasurably greater and more imperialistic than they dream of being; and moreover that great destiny will force them into an alliance, not overt and declared, but all the more real because tacit, with Britain for the defense and promotion of the hopes and liberties of all humanity. The 20th century is to witness the rise of the Anglo-Saxon confederation.

My Mourning for an American Friend.

Coleridge used to say that there were some men so remarkable that if you casually met them as strangers when sheltering under a tree during a shower and had a chat with them just once in your life for a few minutes, you would never forget them. I have been struck again and again with that kind of fascination in many American men and women. I can justly pay that tribute of admiration to many an individual whose acquaintance I have been privileged to make in the great American citizenship. And a very special tribute I desire to pay to one with whom in London, during his stay in England, I enjoyed delightful intellectual and spiritual fellowship. Prof. Hinsdale was a star in the firmament of humanity. I had hoped to meet him again, for he used to say he intended to see England. Gracious, grave, gentle, overflowing with knowledge, and equally inclined to impart information and to seek it, to talk and to listen, Prof. Hinsdale was the ideal of a charming companion. I did something towards conducting him about London, at his special request. At almost every point he treated me to some spoken essayette. He was a peripatetic encyclopedia of history. I could not show him anything and find him without full acquaintance with its associations. We sat together one day for a full hour on a bench near the Smithfield Martyrs' Memorial. There we two had a duet. We exchanged ideas about the Middle Ages and the antecedent causes of modern history as it has been played out in Europe and America. Playfully Bro. H. reminded me that it was England which made a present of the institution of negro slavery to America and then after long time wanted America suddenly to abrogate it. Hinsdale was a beautiful debater. He was a fine writer. His works should live. I condole with his family and with the American churches and colleges. He cannot be replaced, for he was in some respects without an equal.

An Exquisite Lecture.

It is the custom at the new year for some of the great scientific societies in London to give to crowds of children entertaining and instructive lectures on learned subjects. These are always most delightful occasions. Prof. Bottomley has given at the London Institute a lecture on "Flowers." In it he gave not only philosophical explanations but some little sermonettes. On the color of flowers he showed that white flowers were generally the most highly scented, and also that they were the most unselfish, their lovely pure whiteness being the result of their reflecting all the rays of color in the light, while purple, red, yellow and other tinted blossoms maintain their glory by absorbing all the rays excepting those of the color thrown back to greet the eye. So, said the professor, human beings who are the most unselfish are always the most fragrant in their characters. Then the lecturer made some horrible revelations! He added another chapter to the tale of wickedness and deceit that lie in the heart of those beautiful innocent-looking flowers which have tempted so many fond people into the primrose path of poetry. The colors which inspire poetic and frenzied word-struggles are flaunting advertisements and glaring sky-signs. But the arum-lilies, the lords and ladies of our innocent childhood, are far worse, we are now told. They are drink-shops and murder dens. The victim is tempted inside, he is made drunk and escape is as impossible for him as for a lobster to get out of a lobster-pot. It is all very sad, but it is just as well that we should know the truth.

The First Day of the Century in England.

In one respect the 20th century began just as the 19th century did. Christmas day in 1800 was warm and muggy and so was Christmas day in 1900. A hundred years ago the clerk of the weather made a good resolution for the new year and was the first to break it; and he behaved precisely in the same manner at the inauguration of the 20th century. We had singularly disappointing atmospheric auspices in London on new year's day. Though the skies wept at the passing of the old century they soon cleared, and the suburbs woke up to find a cold, clear day, rich in promise of snow and ice and skating and high spirits. The promise was not kept. The morning was not old when rain set in and combined itself with fog and darkness in the center of the town. The afternoon was as black as despair and not all the electric lamps and incandescent gas mantles of the metropolis could lift the dreary gloom of the first day of the century. As an omen the weather lacked nothing that the pessimists could desire. But London is a place of perfect felicity compared with Paris, that beautiful continental Gehenna. In that city, five suicides, due to want and despair, took place on the eve of the new century. Here in London the right keynote was set by the Dean of Westminster in his sermon on new year's morning preached in St. Paul's Cathedral. He said that the isolation of the English nation among European countries, the social and religious conditions of the people, were matters to make us anxious. But we should meet all such questions not with drooping spirits and wringing of hands, but by going forward in the right into the dark, uncertain future with our trust in God. I think it is historically true that the very spirit in which the Dean exhorted the English people to begin the 20th century was just the mood in which our brave forefathers started the 19th. B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The report of the Ecumenical Missionary Conference, held in New York last April, is in print. It makes two volumes of nearly 500 pages each. The report is the best edited work of the kind that I ever saw. The material composing these volumes has not been thrown together in a hodgepodge. Editorial work, thoughtful and discriminating, has been done. An index makes the report invaluable for reference. If you mean to be an up-to-date man in your knowledge of the effort now in progress to win the world to faith in the Christ you must own and use the report of the Ecumenical Missionary Conference.

There is, in this work, a bibliography of missions covering 27 pages. If you propose to be a student of missions in all lands and of missionary problems, this bibliography, you will find, possesses great value. There are five pages containing the names of volumes in which are recorded the lives of noble men and women who have wrought in Africa, North America, the West Indies, South America, China and her dependencies, India, Burmah, Japan, the Malay Archipelago, Persia, Turkey, Armenia, Syria, and Oceanica. The stories of missionary heroism, as I am sure you well know, are thrillingly interesting. Do you not think that we ought to encourage our people to read these narratives in preference to the current popular literature? I am sure that with a little encouragement on the part of the pastor an interest in this style of literature can be generated in the minds of even the young people. Let us see what can be done along this line.

The report of the Ecumenical Missionary Conference can be obtained through the president of our Foreign Christian Missionary Society—A. McLean, Cincinnati, O. I am not authorized to make this statement but I feel quite sure that you can obtain this invaluable book from him. The word invaluable is used in this connection with deliberation. I sincerely believe that, to you, the value of this report cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. Almost every phase of the missionary problem is treated by well-informed men. The treatment is not exhaustive but a door is opened through which you can pass and investigate, without limit, to the advantage of yourself and those whom you may be able to influence. The price of the book is only one dollar—a dollar for the two volumes. Add to this thirty-six cents to pay postage. There is no money in this for any one. How two such volumes can be furnished for a dollar surpasses my comprehension.

A speech that created a sensation in the conference was that of A. J. F. Behrends, D. D., of the Central Congregational Church in Brooklyn. This single address is worth to you more than a dollar. I say to you with emphasis, because I know that you are a disciple of the Disciples and an address from such a source containing their plea for Christian union will afford you peculiar pleasure. Among other excellent things Dr. Behrends said that union in the work of world-wide evangelization is surely coming and that "when it does come, it will come like a resistless flood; and then," said he, "look out for the tramp of the great host, and the flaming feet of the Captain! That will bring the fulfillment of the apocalyptic vision!"

In another place in this great speech, Dr. Behrends said that missionaries in foreign lands "have learned that Japan and China will never utter the shibboleths of our schools. They have concentrated upon fundamentals. They listen in silence, with wondering eyes and with burdened hearts, to many of our disputations. They know what kind of a gospel the great world needs; and I have sometimes thought that it might be well if they should draw up a creed binding upon us who stay at home. At all events the simplicity which has mastered them must master us."

The few Disciples who were so fortunate as to be present when Dr. Behrends spoke, I am sure, will not soon forget their own emotions when he exclaimed, "We must come back to the New Testament. Our religion must centralize in personal devotion to the personal Christ."

It was better for the gifted pastor of the Brooklyn Central Congregational Church to say these things than for any man belonging to the Disciples of Christ to have said them. The effect was more profound and far reaching.

A few days after the delivery of this masterful speech, in some important respects the address of the World's Missionary Conference, Dr. Behrends was called to meet Him who prayed as never man prayed for the unity of all who believe. It is probable that the last work which engaged the thought of Dr. Behrends was the careful revision of this speech for the book of which I speak.

The brief address of J. H. Garrison, of course, is in this report. It gives no uncertain sound as to the union of Christians as a condition precedent to the successful evangelization of the world.

This report will be followed soon by a volume devoted to the statistics of missions. There is here a statistical summary, necessarily brief, prepared by Dr. J. S. Dennis, the well-known author of two stately volumes on, "Christian Missions and Social Progress."

While I am speaking of missionary literature permit me to call your attention to three small and inexpensive books possessing unusual merit. I refer to a "Hand-Book of Missions," by A. McLean; "Heroes of Modern Missions," by W. J. Lhamon; and "Missionary Fields and Forces," from the pen of the same gifted author. The last book named treats of the missionary fields and forces of the Disciples of Christ. McLean's "Hand-Book of Missions" contains a marvelous amount of valuable information, attractively presented. Lhamon's "Heroes of Modern Missions" whets the appetite for other biographical missionary literature.

These books are worth, that is, they sell for, thirty-five cents a volume—they are worth vastly more to one who desires to be informed concerning the great missionary enterprise. They belong to the list of books prepared for our Bethany Christian Endeavor Reading Courses, and are published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago.

The time for the annual offering to have the gospel preached to the whole creation is rapidly approaching. Let us get ready for it. Let us prepare our people to contribute liberally and cheerfully to the support of this supremely important enterprise. The best preparation is to fill our own minds with facts and then give them freely to the people.

The Place of Missions in the Christian Life.

By A. McLean.

In a recent address the Archbishop of Canterbury said that so far from being outside the ordinary Christian life, every Christian is bound, as a part of his ordinary life, as a part of his service of the Lord, and as a part of the expression of his gratitude for what God has done for his soul, to take a real share in promoting the great work which the Lord has intrusted to his church. These are words of truth and soberness. They should be pondered with care and moral earnestness. The missionary enterprise is not something foreign to the life of the believer. It is an essential part of his life. As he nourishes and cherishes his own flesh and spirit, as he cares for and supports the family which God has given him, so should he care for and support this work of God. Apart from every other consideration he needs to do this to make his own calling and election sure. He needs to do so if he would grow in grace and in knowledge of the truth. He must do so if he would live in moral sympathy with his Lord. There is nothing that will do more for one's own soul than to foster this burning desire to win others to the cross also.

This is a part of the service which he owes his Redeemer. It cannot be too often repeated that, whilst the salvation of mankind is the work of Christ, he has left his followers to proclaim that salvation. There is no sign of any miraculous interposition in all history to make known that which the Lord did in his own person during his life here on the earth and on the cross; and it is clear that unless we do this work, it will never be done at all. Christ tasted death for every man. He gave himself a ransom for all. Those for whom he died have a right to know that fact. It is his will that they shall know it. He said, "This gospel of the kingdom must be preached in the whole world for a testimony to all the nations." This is the one task that he assigned his disciples. It is the duty of every believer to bear the knowledge of that which is the highest of all possible knowledge to those who have it not. The promise is, "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." The problem is, "How shall they call upon him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher, and how shall they preach except they be sent?" Loyalty to Christ requires of us that we do what we can to give a knowledge of salvation to all who are sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death. Be it known that this work stands in the first rank of all the tasks we have to fulfill. If through selfishness or any other reason we remain silent when we ought to speak, we shall be verily guilty before God.

Every redeemed soul should assist in the missionary enterprise as an expression of gratitude for what the Lord has done for him in his own experience. He can say, "Christ loved me, and gave himself for me." He has been pardoned. He has received the gift of the Holy Spirit. His privileges are far beyond anything which he deserved, and far beyond anything he could have dared to hope for. Gratitude for what he has received should impel him to do as much as in him lies to publish the glad tidings far and near. Having tasted the good word of God and the power of the world to come, he is bound by that wonderful blessing to take no rest as long as there remains any one to be brought to the cross of Christ. The apostles were saved from sin. They were endued with power from on high. At once they began to make the truth known. When commanded to be silent, they said, "We cannot but speak what we saw and heard." The truth in them must find expression. If a follower of Christ seeks to keep the light he has to himself and is indifferent to the fate of others, he may well doubt whether he has been accepted or not.

It should be the desire of every Christian man to have a real share in promoting the work which the Lord has intrusted to his church. Many are in partial sympathy now; they do something. But thus far the church has never put her whole heart and mind and soul and strength into this cause. The Christians of these United States give fifty cents each for missions at home and abroad. Compared with the money wasted in drink or in pleasure or for harmful luxuries this is a paltry pittance. There are single Christian men who could easily give all that is given by all the Christians in this land. The wealth of the nation is for the most part in the hands of those who call Jesus Lord. They are well able to give immeasurably more than they have ever given. As the time for the March offering for Foreign Missions approaches, every Christian should ask himself how much he owes his Lord. If there are arrears because of past neglect extraordinary sacrifices should be made.

Does the Church Express the Mind of Christ?

By BISHOP E. R. HENDRIX

His First Text.

That was a wonderful Scripture lesson which our Lord selected with which to open his ministry. It was from Isaiah, his favorite book, as it was also the favorite book of John the Baptist, his Forerunner, and the greatest of the prophets because of the clearest spiritual vision. The Baptist preferred it because he found there his great theme, "a voice crying in the wilderness, Behold the Lamb of God." Jesus preferred it because it announced so clearly what has been fitly called "the program of Christianity." It is not strange, therefore, that when Jesus returned from his victory over the world, the flesh and the devil, as he recovered our Paradise in the wilderness, despite the prolonged and fierce assaults of Satan, he should re-enter his familiar synagogue of Nazareth with his Scripture lesson already chosen. It described that Paradise which he had just won after Satan had shot every arrow in his quiver, and "having ended all the temptation, departed from him for a season." He who had himself overcome was now prepared to help others overcome, and to open the kingdom of heaven to believers.

A Kingdom of Righteousness.

That kingdom was not of this world, either in its origin or fulfilment. It did not dispute Cæsar's title, but bade men render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's. Yet the kingdom of heaven was at hand, and its blessings, its citizenship, its rights and emoluments, were to begin now. The largess of the conqueror, what was it? No barbaric gold and pearls, but righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. He announces his program from that hour: "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the poor; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn; to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion; to give unto them a garland for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified." What can better express the mind of Christ than these chosen words, which announce the program of Christianity?

Garlands for Ashes.

The mind of Christ respecting his Church shows a joyful and resourceful ministry, preaching glad tidings to a sad, sorrowing and even despairing world. Because men have reached the depths of poverty—that Oriental poverty which is hopeless, whether born of vice or oppression—they need a gospel of hope, and good men and true to preach it. The broken-hearted must have garlands for ashes. Men are led captive by Satan at his will until there must come a divine deliverance from the bondage of wicked habits and vicious lives. Nay, human courts, where Christ does not rule, forget the prisoners whom they sentence. There must be men of the John Howard type who shall devote themselves to the lazar-houses until they shall open the prison to them that are bound. The world is full of despair. Science is sad-eyed and sad-hearted. Its very voice is one of sadness and despondency, as if it would welcome some mighty cataclysm which might end the universal gloom. But God's messengers proclaim, "God's in his heaven, all's well with the world," as they proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God. Our God will reward the good as well as punish the evil. The heaven that shuts in also shuts out. The city of God has twelve gates, "to bring the honor and glory of the nations into it," but without are "the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars." "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

The Realism of Good.

Men see clearly the realism of evil. What is needed is some one to proclaim the realism of good. The secular press, current literature, the stage, all portray, and ceaselessly, the realism of evil. It is their very stock in trade. They will manufacture and invent it, even though compelled the next day to deny it. Flaming headlines and bill boards all bid men distrust their fellows, until the prophet's voice is needed as never before, answering the cry of the universal spirit of heaviness, "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?" The acceptable year of the Lord is a time of consolation, of hope. "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Good men take up the refrain and exhort, "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." The mind of Christ is expressed so long as there are men to proclaim the fundamental fact, the underlying principle, of the mission of Christ: "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil."

The Church is Inclusive.

The Church of to-day might be so defined as to include only those expressing the mind of Christ, thus making "a vicious circle" in our definition. Now, as in Paul's time, they are not all Israel who are of Israel. But so long as there are those in the Church of Christ, of whatever name, who possess the mind of Christ as declared by himself in the very opening as well as the close of his earthly ministry, there is a remnant that can save as well as that shall be saved. The Church once conquered the world under the leadership of the apostles and martyrs, until the Roman senate formally adopted the Christian religion as the religion of the Roman people. The world then re-invaded and conquered the Church, and more than one mighty reformation and religious upheaval has been necessary to prevent conformity to the world and an abject surrender to worldly methods and practices. That we need such a spiritual quickening in our day as to give a new and fresh setting to the things that are not seen and are eternal is the profound conviction of every devout Christian thinker.

The World in the Church.

The Church of to-day contains apologists for things material, perverting the language of the apostle, "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural," as if there were to be a gradual evolution of the spiritual out of the natural. Men are too often encouraged thus in the mad race for wealth because the Church may become the beneficiary of it. The pulpit is in danger of becoming the echo of the pew, and the prophet of God is prone to have his voice muffled by the gold of Balak. Weak sentimentality in the pulpit will never make a virile church. Nor will an institutional church suffice in the maintenance and development of Christian life that does not give a saving gospel as well as bread and baths to the poor. "Bread and games" pleased and satisfied the populace, and kept many a throne from tottering in the days of the apostles, who lifted the veil from personal and domestic and official life of a people perishing without the gospel.

A New Incarnation.

The climax of the gospel, the very mind of Christ, is the giving of the gospel to the poor as the power of God unto salvation. Men compare the ethics of Christianity with the ethics of Buddha and Confucius, until they suddenly discover that "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." The demand of our day is for a superhuman movement on the part of Christianity for the salvation alike of China and the world. The mind of Christ must find fresh expression in a self-sacrificing, persistent, tireless movement for the salvation of men, and of all men. Still, with all her shortcomings, never was there so much of the mind of Christ expressed in his Church as in the Church of to-day, which sends more missionaries to the field, more nurses to the suffering, more messages of hope to them that are bound, more Bibles into the homes, more prayers to heaven, than has been done at any period since the ascension of our Lord.

The other day a guide was showing an American around St. Paul's in London.

"That, sir," said the man, "his the tomb of the greatest naval 'ero Europe or the world hever knew—Lord Nelson's. This marble sarcoughogus weighs forty-two tons. Hinside that his a steel receptacle weighing twelve tons and hinside that his a leaden casket 'ermetically sealed, weighing over two tons. Hinside that his a mahogany coffin holding the ashes of the great 'ero."

"Well," said the visitor, after thinking a while, "I guess you've got him. If ever he gets out of that, cable me at my expense."

From Chaos to Cosmos.

By J. M. Lowe.

The Church has been busy declaring what it believes. What declarations of faith and what a dearth of deeds! Even yet it is more important to revise a creed or to declare that we have no creed than to redeem a lost world. The world may be lost but we must not lose a point. Do we believe that people are going to unite because they agree? Agreement is not union. Witness all the quarrels that have separated people of the same creed from the time that Paul and Barnabas spoke sharp words and parted, until now.

If the Disciples of Christ would measure up to their plea, there would be less of chaos and more of cosmos in christendom. Presbyterians are Presbyterians, Methodists are Methodists, Baptists are Baptists. Such they declare themselves to be and such they are. They do not pretend to be anything more. If they are sectarian, it is fair to say that they are consistently so. But what about us? We have the common family name, confession, baptism and communion. We dare not be sectarian. We declare that we are not. But a glance over the world will reveal a continent of inconsistency. There are the five points of Calvinism, the five points of Arminianism; and many adhere to the "plan of salvation" with as much creedal tenacity as do the others to their points of doctrine.

The great leading bodies of Protestantism practice faith, repentance, confession, baptism (or intend to), communion, prayer, purity, charity and evangelism. They are as faithful as we, as penitent, as prayerful, as pure, and as to giving for missions, they put us to shame. Now, what is our contention? Many of these people have never been baptized, and when they pray, they say: "Give us a baptism of the Holy Ghost,' and they do not commune every Lord's day. Is that all? No, there is the name. If we were as true to our name as the denominations are to theirs, we would do passing well. Their name is this or that, but their character is Christian.

"The rank is but the guinea's stamp
The man's the gowd [gold] for a' that."

Do people commune because they sip the wine and break the bread, or do they sip the wine and break the bread because they commune? Are people united because they meet in the same house? Are they divided because they meet in different houses? Does a church consist of a building and a roll of names?

Our very position and plea demand that we take the initiative in church co-operation. We are logically the leaders in all attempts looking toward a broader, fuller fellowship in the kingdom of God. Our plea is not exclusive. The lordship of Jesus is our watchword. The business of the church in this world is to defeat the powers of darkness under the leadership of King Jesus. We are soldiers. Doctrinal differences have as little place in this fight as at Bunker Hill or Gettysburg. The only article of faith is boundless trust in our leader. The world is dying. We cannot stay to discuss differences. We have no time for debate, especially since there is nothing to debate over. Protestantism is essentially one in faith. We are sufficiently at one to engage in all the good work in which we could engage if we were organically one. In some of our cities our churches (Disciples) are no more united in good work than they are with the M. E's. or Presbyterians. Agreement is not harmony. We must do something more than agree. We must love each other. I am a Disciple of Christ in a larger sense than that of being identified with the current reformation. Yet I am sure that the dream of our fathers was larger than any religious body.

Back of the schools of medicine there is the true science of medicine and health. Back of the denominations, and larger than any one or all combined, is the Christianity of Christ.

America's Debt.

By R. P. Anderson.

When I stepped ashore at New York, some years ago, among the first questions addressed to me was this one: "Well, what do you think of America?" There was the quiet confidence in the questioner that proclaimed that his enquiry could only be answered in one way. I begged for time to form an opinion. When I had been in the states a year, each day revealing new wonders, I was prepared to say that America was the greatest country in the world. Another year did not alter this opinion, but it added fresh reflections. I began to think that Americans applied the Monroe doctrine —very beneficent and wise, no doubt, in questions of politics—to matters with which it had nothing to do. And among these matters—Europe!

The reformation of the nineteenth century would have been impossible in Europe. Only the freedom and freshness of the young land could have developed such a movement as Alexander Campbell commenced, to such enormous dimensions as it has attained today. America is rejuvenated Europe—Europe loosed from its conservatism and born again. But this very fact, that Europe supplied the materials out of which this great nation has grown, puts America into debt towards her. The American national debt cannot be altogether reckoned in dollars. America can only clear off some of the old score by discarding the Monroe doctrine on the spiritual plane, and seeking to implant in Europe the spirit of liberty and research and the love of truth that have grown within her borders.

The first installments of this debt are being paid off by the great missionary societies; but paid to the heathen. Europe has claims. Something in this respect has certainly been done. But it appears to me that the United States has not quite realized what may be done or what ought to be done. In England we have some churches; in Norway, Sweden and Denmark a few. Otherwise Europe is untouched. Paul said: "I am a debtor." Is there not occasion for us to say the same?

To plant in Europe the movement inaugurated in America to plant the banner of primitive Christianity there, is no light task. It is not a question that can be dabbled in, or experimented with. We need the clear eye to see our duty, and the firm and resolute heart to carry it through in spite of all obstacles and difficulties. It is not only a question of the national spirit, but of the cause of Christ. There are fields open to us. If we only take up thoroughly the countries in which we are already engaged, we have a great work before us. Let us give the heathen countries their due. They need more than that, even. But let us also turn our eyes to the old countries that are, after all, the mothers of the new, and remember the first commandment with promise. "I am a debtor" to Europe.

Christianity a Disturbing Element.

By James N. Crutcher.

One man has said that the church is "God between four walls," while another says it is "an order built up out of the world." If either definition is correct, the church is justified in looking at men and women as "religious prey," and no man need complain if it "takes advantage of a frightful human condition to build up an institution." If the church is to be considered as merely a place where programs are carried out at stated times and the world is comforted by a weak, lifeless message concerning divine things, then it is trifling with human souls. Such a church becomes an end not a means. Its people "go to services" instead of worshiping as a preparation of mind and heart for service. Its mission is accomplished when a large membership is gained and a fine temple is erected for public worship. It strives to entertain rather than to lead the people into lives of vital godlikeness. If its minister removes "the pale winding sheet of general terms" from sin and tells in tragic plainness the gospel of Christ, the voices of the people are heard with the cry: "The prophet is a fool and the spiritual man is mad." If knaves make a mock of sin it is because they have been taught to look upon it as a matter of course, with feelings of calm serenity, instead of having "deep searchings of heart" as the result of faithful preaching of the hideousness and unnaturalness of a life of sin.

A preacher of long ago told the people of sin and judgment and raised a "tumult," while in another place he got himself called a "babbler" and created "no small stir." He was accused of "turning the world upside down." He touched the business interests of Ephesus and a prominent man raised up a mob against him. This same Paul went to the Eternal City, knowing that bonds and afflictions awaited him, yet his life was not counted dear unto himself.

Jesus called the clergy of his times "blind fools," "like unto whitewashed sepulchres filled with bones." The same unclean brood used its influence at the capital, with the governor, to have "this same Christ" crucified. And on Calvary, the white-robed priests "sat down and there they watched him die." The Christ had no rose-water moral code to delight the ear and tickle the fancy. His warning to his followers was full of pathos—that they need not be surprised at persecutions and even death as his disciples. "Offenses must come, but woe to him by whom they come." "Fiery trials," baptisms of sorrow and merciless deaths were to be their heritage. His gospel was to quicken the dead consciences of men, and such resurrections were of more value than the mere raising of a body from the tomb. No man was to have rest until he had "that peace that passeth all understanding." His gospel would disturb family ties, social conditions, and civic life. His followers were to be always in the enemy's country. Men would cry: "Peace! Peace!" when no peace was theirs. His message of salvation would be no comfort to those in sin—his disciples would cry aloud and spare not. Everything being done with the wisdom of serpents and the harmlessness of doves, the knowledge of the glory of God would cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

Current Literature.

A vivid and striking book on one of the most important problems of present-day world-politics is Russia Against India: The Struggle for Asia, by Archibald R. Colquhoun. It is a book with a thesis. All of its description and history and argument issue in the proposition that Great Britain must protect her Indian empire by an active policy in Afghanistan. Russia is creeping on bit by bit toward a control of central and southern Asia as well as Siberia, but Anglo-Saxon domination of India is inseparable from the general interests of the whole Anglo-Saxon race. The development of Russian power and the history of Russian expansion from early times to the present are traced in brief, bold outline. The topography of central Asia and the peoples inhabiting that great region —Tadjiks, Uzbeks, Kirghis, Kalmuks and the endless mixture of the trans-Caucasus region where sixty-eight languages are spoken—are described with enough detail to be vivid and concrete, but with no waste of words. For a writer whose main interest is politics he writes exceptionally well of those phases of national life and custom which appeal to the traveler and the ethnologist. Of British rule in India he can say nothing more cordial than that "it may be and probably is, all things considered, a better one than the natives could hope for under any other rule." But he criticises its "machine-like aspect," in which rules take the place of rulers, and says that there are dangers from within as well as from without—dangers from over-government, from forcing western ideas on the country prematurely and from sacrificing Indian interests to party considerations in England. It is, therefore, not certain that England would have the thoroughly loyal support of India in a conflict with Russia.

Afghanistan, Baluchistan and Persia stand as buffers between Russian Asia and British India. It is impossible to retain them as a neutral zone. Russia is already advancing, England must advance. All the doubtful border on the side of India has already been occupied. The next step must be into Afghanistan proper, toward which Russia's whole advance in central Asia is directed. Passive defense of the present British boundary is not enough. Lines of communication must be opened up, depots and magazines established and Kabul, Kandahar and Seistan must be made British military posts. Such is the outline of the author's plan for meeting the Russian advance.

It is a book of the most cold-blooded politics. The legitimacy of the game is never questioned and there is no suggestion of any benefit expected or desired to the inhabitants of these regions. The native races are considered only as offering possible resistance or affording possible help to the British advance. The only question is how to play the game to win. If one can take that cool view of the case, forget that there is such a thing as morality in politics and make no scruple at the value of human lives, he will find the book one of thrilling interest. In any case it conveys a vast amount of information as to the present situation. (Harper & Bros.)

The story of the Siege in Peking is told by Dr. W. A. P. Martin, President of the Chinese Imperial University, in a style which one cannot expect or desire to see improved upon. For fifty years he has been a resident in the Chinese capital. Twenty-five years he served as President of the Imperial College at Peking and since then has been President of the Imperial University, a position offered to him by the Emperor. As an eyewitness of the siege of the legations and a participant in all its horrors and sufferings, Dr. Martin is qualified to speak with authority. And he not only tells the story of the siege but in a very brief compass outlines the situation in China and shows the causes which have brought it about. Dr. Martin's earlier volume entitled "A Cycle of Cathay" is already a classic and this book, though hastily prepared and dealing in a somewhat journalistic fashion with a particular event, will be a book of more than passing value. (Revell. $1.)

It has long since been discovered by both writers and readers of missionary biographies that the life of a missionary is as full of excitement, and may be made as interesting to the general reader as an account of the exploits of a professional explorer. James Evans, an account of whose work among the Indians of Canada is given in The Apostle of the North, by Egerton R. Young, had this sort of a career. But his biographer scarcely measures up to the possibilities of his subject on the side of adventure. As a religious treatise it is pious, instructive, sometimes a trifle prolix. As a tale of exploits among the Indian tribes of the north, it is mild and seldom thrilling. (Revell. $1.25.)

February Magazines.

The secret of the successful ten cent magazize seems to consist in thinking up subjects about which no one cared to know and have them written up so that the reader will be pleased at the treatment as well as surprised to see the subject treated at all. The Ladies' Home Journal has articles about the great clock at the Greenwich Observatory; about the only herd of buffaloes in the world owned by a woman; and about the little known author of "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Josiah Allen's wife's series of Samantha sketches, the last of which happily appears in the present issue, is rather more tedious than usual. But the other things are mostly good and the eleven pictures of Alaska scenery help one to a larger appreciation of the scenic beauties of our country.

The attempt of Andree to reach the North Pole by balloon had the usual result—a failure and a relief expedition. In this case the relief expedition was little more than a hopeless search through northern Siberia for traces of the baloonist and his craft. The Century contains the first of two papers by Jonas Stadling, who was the leader of the expedition. Ruth McEnery Stuart writes another of her "sonny" stories wherein sonny's father monologuizes on the subject of women and the emancipation movement in Simpkinsville. There are more than the usual number of short stories in this number which is called the Midwinter Fiction Number.

People who take pride in their ancestry should read the brief article in Frank Leslie's entitled Pride of Birth, which graphically illustrates the fact that even if you can trace your genealogical line back to your great great grandfather's great great grandfather and find him a noble cavalier, you have still two hundred and fifty-five ancestors of that same generation who are equally related to you and many of whom were probably not nice people at all. It is a solemn warning not to investigate too deeply into your ancestry.

The World's Work contains a multitude of illustrations, mostly photographic and some of them a trifle irrelevant. The editorial survey of the events of the month is well written and studiously colorless on all disputed points. Among the men of note who are made the subjects of articles in this number are Cecil Rhodes, John Marshall, General Kitchener, C. J. Bush, the cartoonist, and Emperor William. The department entitled Among the World's Workers, is unique, consisting of a series of paragraphs on industrial economy and mechanical topics.

Everybody's Magazine, besides being a somewhat copious advertiser of the Wanamaker products of all sorts, is coming to be a very good sort of magazine. It contains an article by Richard Harding Davis on "Curiosities of Courage," which is full of curious incidents gleaned from the several campaigns which he has witnessed, and the first part of an interesting study in domestic economy by J. P. Mowbray, entitled "The Making of a Country Home."

Admirers of Richard Harding Davis will be glad to read the account of his career and personality as given in the leading article in Ainslee's Magazine. Whatever one may think about the value of Mr. Davis' contributions to literature, he has at least the faculty of writing readable stories and of getting himself talked about, and that is something which some of his detractors lack. An illustrated article on Yale characterizes it as "the most democratic of our colleges."

The Living Age comes around so frequently that one falls into the habit of classing it among newspapers rather than among the magazines. Among the many excellent articles which it has recently reprinted, choosing them from among the leading magazines of Europe and America, are Paul Bourget's description of "A Parisian Household," and Mrs. John Richard Green's account of a visit to the Boer prisoners at St. Helena.

John Kendrick Bangs has struck a promising vein in his Memories of Santa Claus, the first number of which appears in the Woman's Home Companion. The same magazine contains a fanciful story by Carmen Sylva, Queen of Roumania, which is better literature than most queens could write, and one must search long to find a better page of very short stories than those which appear under the title, The Leisure Half Hour.

The chief features of the Chautauquan are still its serials on The Rivalry of Nations, A Reading Journey in the Orient, and Critical Studies in French Literature. Besides these there are the usual editorial paragraphs on Current Happenings.

The Ledger Monthly contains such a variety of contents that it is difficult to single out any special feature for comment. It is an all-round family magazine with stories and suggestions, and side talks, and fashion plates, and anecdotes, and cooking recipes.

Food In Mexico.

American Food, Grape-Nuts, Replaces Native Food.

A gentleman from the City of Mexico, Paul T. Gadsden, writes that himself and some other members of his family could not live comfortably on the ordinary food in Mexico, and after using the native food for some months, finally got into a run-down and exhausted condition.

He says: "An American feels most acutely the need in mind and body of some of the invigorating food he has been raised on in the States. Several months ago when I was particularly feeling the need of some change in food, I noticed Grape-Nuts in the window of one of the large grocery stores here, and remembering how, in the States, some little nieces and nephews had grown fat and healthy on it, almost exclusively, I bought two packages, to see if it succeeded as well with grown-up people.

"From that day to this it has never been absent from our table. With us, the exhaustion and enervation caused by this climate and the miserable diet, has entirely disappeared, and we are all in most excellent health, vigor and spirits."

Our Budget.

—This is the month of sowing for the March harvest.

—It is to be hoped that the sowing of the past years, too, will count largely in the March offering for Foreign Missions.

—Let it be remembered that this is a movement of all the churches in behalf of world-wide evangelization. It is neither sectional, local nor partisan. It is a "free for all."

—We notice some of the papers are publishing the names of preachers who are interested in the March offering. Permit us to save this space by saying that every live minister in our ranks and every live church, whether rich or poor, whether in debt or out of debt, whether meeting in a school-house or in a building of its own, is interested in this great work, and will take a hand in the March offering.

—The good work of evangelization at home, in successful meetings throughout the country, still goes on with unabated interest. This revival of work at home should lend additional interest to the work abroad, and to every department of church activity. A true revival revives every interest in the kingdom of God. A good test of conversion is the interest the convert feels in the salvation of others.

—Prof. Herbert L. Willett, of the University of Chicago and the Disciples' Divinity House, has perhaps won wider recognition as a Bible student than any other man among us. His lectures on Christianity of the First Century will be published in a few weeks by the Revell Company under the title "Early Christianity." If the book is as popular as the lectures it will have a wide circulation.

—The annual report of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society shows that the work in England has cost the Society $10,997.98. Attention is called by Bro. J. Coop, Treasurer of the English Society, to the fact that of this sum $6,506.76 has been contributed by friends in England, as shown on another page of the same report. This will correct any wrong impression that might otherwise have been formed in regard to the expensiveness of the work in England.

—A sound article on Denominationalism, by E. R. Groves, appears in Word and Works, of the Yale Divinity School. Its points are that denominational distinctions represent differences of opinion in matters in which liberty of judgment ought to be allowed; that there is at present often more difference between the views of different members of the same denomination than between average members of different denominations; and that there is no reason why, for practical purposes, the Church should be divided into sections on the basis of differing beliefs on non-essential matters. These are good clear points, all of them, and we are glad to see that their constant iteration in the west is arousing an echo in the east.

—The new brick church at Pleasantville, Iowa, costing $7,500, built under the leadership of F. D. Ferrall, was dedicated free of debt, Jan. 13th, Rev. Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind., officiating. For 28 years this worthy congregation had been meeting in a white frame church. Now a beautiful modern structure adorns the spot The structure has auditorium, with lecture-room separated by folding doors, gallery, choir loft and choir assembly room, pastor's study, modern baptistry and robing-rooms with basement under the entire building. The heating is accomplished by a furnace. Seating capacity 700. The pastor will be assisted in a meeting, beginning Feb. 10th, by H. C. Patterson, of Irvington, Ind. Mr. Ferrall is in his third year with this congregation, during which time more than 120 members have been received into fellowship.

—A good Christian physician can find a promising opening at Unionville, Orange Co., Va. For particulars address James B. Martin at that place.

—Walter P. Jennings, who has finished his course at the College of the Bible, at Lexington, visited this office on his way to Lampasas, Texas, where he is beginning his pastorate.

—J. O. Rose, of Lebanon, Ind., writes that he is recovering rapidly from his recent attack of typhoid fever, and after a few weeks' recreation on the farm with his father, hopes to be back in the work again.

—Bro. Geo. W. Kemper, of Midway, Ky., editor of the Messenger, is recovering from a severe attack of pneumonia. He reports that there have been fifty-two additions to the church at that place during the past year.

—Ex-President Benjamin Harrison and Hon. William Dudley Foulke will be the principal speakers at the Founders' Day exercises of Butler College on Feb. 7. The annual Founders' Day banquet will be held at the Denison hotel, of Indianapolis, on the evening of the same day.

—A co-operative farm established in northeastern Iowa wants a few more families who must be members of the Christian Church and must present satisfactory evidence of Christian character and industrious habits. We have no personal knowledge of the institution and make this announcement by request. For particulars address "Farm," care of Mr. J. A. Naley, Olin, Jones Co., Ia.

—We are not alone among temperance people in our disapproval of the hatchet method of enforcing prohibition. The following sentence is from a personal letter from a widely-known and veteran preacher: "You know I lived a long time in Kansas and that Pardee Butler led the fight for prohibition among our people. But, with you, I do not endorse the tactics of Mrs. Nation."

—W. T. Moore is having a fine meeting at Warren, O. There were fourteen additions when last word was received, though, the primary object of the meeting was the instruction. Of Bro. Vanhorn, his old co-laborer in England, Bro. Moore writes: "He is very popular with his church and the community. He is a fine preacher and excellent pastor." Those who heard his Kansas City address can easily believe what is said of his ability as a preacher.

—It gives us pleasure to announce that the book which has been for more than a year in preparation, entitled "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century," is now all in type, and as soon as the presses and bindery can do their work, we will be ready to fill orders for it. The writers—Charles Louis Loos, B. B. Tyler, W. T. Moore, T. W. Grafton, Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean and Miss Lois White—have revised their contributions, and the history has been brought down to date. To these historical sketches has been added a closing chapter, entitled "Lessons From the Past," by the editor of this paper, who has given editorial supervision to the work. We believe this volume will supply the very information which ought to be in possession of all the Disciples of Christ. Further announcements will be made from time to time.

That is dyspepsia.
It makes life miserable.
Its sufferers eat not because they want — but because they must.
They know they are irritable and fret but they cannot be otherwise.

—The tenth annual session of the Tuskegee Negro Conference will be held at Tuskegee, Ala., Feb. 20, and will be followed by a conference of the teachers and officers of the various negro schools in the south. These conferences, under the leadership of Mr. Booker T. Washington, have already accomplished much good in spreading the Tuskegee method of industrial education.

—Dr. Hiram Christopher, of St. Joseph, Missouri, but for many years a resident of St. Louis and one of the elders of the First Church, has departed this life. No particulars have reached us yet as to his death, but we shall doubtless receive a suitable notice of his life and labors. He was a brother-in-law of T. P. Haley and of J. W. McGarvey. He was a man of singularly pure life and a writer of fine ability. Many years ago he contributed quite regularly to our periodical literature. Many of his contributions to this paper were signed "C. Darr Post." His book on The Atonement showed him to be a man of considerable research and of independent thought. He was familiar with many of the great preachers among us with whom he was contemporary. Though a physician by profession and practice, his chief interest was in religion. He was a lover of good men, a lover of God, and loved to talk of the deeper things of the kingdom of God. He attained to a good old age and has left behind him the fragrance of a pure life and a spotless reputation.

—On Tuesday night of last week there was an installation service held in the Mt. Cabanne Church in which the new pastor, F. G. Tyrrell, was formally inaugurated. The charge to the church was given by F. O. Fannon of the First Church and the charge to the pastor was given by James McAllister of the Central. W. W. Dowling, of Mt. Cabanne, spoke in behalf of the official board of the church, and there was a response by Brother Tyrrell. There were brief addresses also by Rev. J. C. Cromer of the Fountain Park Congregational Church and by A. J. Marshall, city evangelist. Other ministers of the city participated in various parts of the service. The addresses on the occasion are spoken of as of the highest quality, and the whole occasion as very impressive and helpful in its influence. Although the night was unfavorable, a good audience was present to witness and participate in these exercises. We certainly join the many friends of Brother Tyrrell in wishing him a very prosperous pastorate at Mt. Cabanne.

WOMAN'S KIDNEYS.

Thousands of Women Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

To Prove What SWAMP-ROOT, the Great Kidney Remedy, will do for YOU, Every Reader of the "Christian-Evangelist" May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Free by Mail.

Among the many famous cures of Swamp-Root, none seem to speak higher of the wonderful curative properties of this great kidney remedy than the one published this week for the benefit of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers.

"You have no idea how well I feel. I am satisfied that I do not need any more medicine, as I am in as good health as I ever was in my life." So says Mrs. Mary Engelhardt, of 2835 Madison Street, St. Louis, Mo., to a reporter of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. "For more than ten years I had suffered with what the doctors termed female trouble; also heart trouble, with swelling of the feet and limbs. Last summer I felt so badly that I thought I had not long to live. I consulted doctor after doctor and took their medicines, but felt no better. The physicians told me my kidneys were not affected, and while I Did Not Know I Had Kidney Trouble,

I somehow felt certain my kidneys were the cause of my trouble. A friend recommended me to try Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and I must say I derived immense benefit almost from the first week. I continued the medicine, taking it regularly, and I am now in splendid health. The pains and aches have all gone. I have recommended Swamp-Root to all my friends, and told them what it has done for me. I will gladly answer any one who desires to write me regarding my case. I most heartily indorse Swamp-Root from every standpoint. There is such a pleasant taste to Swamp-Root, and it goes right to the weak spots and drives them out of the system."

MRS. MARY ENGELHARDT.

Swamp-Root will do just as much for any housewife whose back is too weak to perform her necessary work, who is always tired and overwrought, who feels that the cares of life are more than she can stand. It is a boon to the weak and ailing.

How to Find Out If You Need Swamp-Root.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys; but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work. So when your kidneys are weak or out of order, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Many women suffer untold misery because the nature of their disease is not correctly understood. They are led to believe that womb trouble or female weakness of some sort is responsible for the many ills that beset womankind.

Neuralgia, nervousness, headache, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, rheumatism, a dragging pain or dull ache in the back, weakness or bearing down sensation, profuse or scanty supply of urine, with strong odor, frequent desire to pass it night or day, with scalding or burning sensation,—these are all unmistakable signs of kidney and bladder trouble.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Other symptons showing that you need Swamp-Root are sleeplessness, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, plenty of ambition but no strength.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Swamp-Root, the great Kidney, Liver and Bladder remedy, is so remarkably successful that a special arrangement has been made by which all CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers who have not already tried it may have a sample bottle sent absolutely free by mail. Also a book telling all about kidney and bladder troubles and containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured by Swamp-Root. Be sure and mention reading this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, St. Louis, when sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

—The church at Paris, Tex., held its annual reunion on Feb. 3. In place of the morning sermon there were reports from the different organizations of the church. The pastor, J. M. Crutcher, sent out a printed invitation, bearing his annual message and enclosed with it a card bearing the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST's "Creed in Verse," which lately appeared on our cover.

—S. A. Strawn has resigned the pastorate of the church at Owosso, Mich., to take effect at the close of his second year. He is now in the midst of a meeting with six accessions up to date. Brother Strawn is a graduate of Kentucky University and of Drake, and has held several successful pastorates, including Mt. Carmel, Ill., Mattoon, Ill., and Lowell, Ind.

—Homer L. Magee will preach for the Denver church in Worth county the ensuing year. He is a student at Central Christian College.

—Chas. L. Beal, a student of Central Christian College, Albany, Mo., has accepted a call to serve the Elmo church for half time. He preaches the other half at Bedison.

—H. B. Easterling has been called for half time to the church at Mt. Auburn, Ill., and is open for an engagement for the other half. Three years ago Bro. Easterling closed a short pastorate with the same congregation, during which he held a meeting with 111 additions.

—The new Christian Church at Antioch, Ohio, with its entire contents was destroyed by fire on Sunday morning Jan. 27, 1901. The church, which was built at a great sacrifice on the part of its members, had been occupied just two years, and was a neat, beautiful and up-to-date structure. The loss is about $3,000, of which $2,000 is covered by insurance. The congregation will build another edifice at once, and asks the prayers of the brotherhood in the undertaking.

—One of our religious contemporaries editorially bemoans the waning ability of our writers and preachers as regards spirituality, scholarship and literary ability, and asks, Where are the writers who can match the past generation in these regards? By way of answer to this pessimistic query we might suggest that if our contemporary would read its exchanges more diligently and peruse its own columns less intently, it would find considerable real ability in the religious journalism even of these degenerate days.

—The committee in charge of the program of the Congress of Disciples to be held in Lexington in March has arranged for John R. Mott to make one of the addresses. Mr. Mott has been the leader in the Student Volunteer Movement from the first. He has traveled all around the world and has seen the mission work in all fields. He is a speaker of marvelous power. He is heard everywhere with enthusiasm. Perhaps no other living man has done so much for young men or has a greater hold on young men. All the colleges within easy reach of Lexington will be asked to send their teachers and students to hear him at the congress. His address will be one of the most notable features of that gathering.

—The following anecdote very accurately represents the position of the Disciples of Christ on the subject of open and close communion:

"A Methodist minister, noted for his keen mother wit, attended services not a thousand miles from here a few days ago, and was courteously invited to a seat in the pulpit, which he accepted. When the preaching was over the minister in charge, a Baptist, turning to his visitor, said: 'We are now about to commune. If this were my table I would invite you to partake with us, but as it is the Lord's table I have no right to invite anyone.' 'Well,' replied the Methodist, 'if it were your table I might not accept, but since it is the Lord's table, and he has invited me to eat, I shall do so:' and he did."

—Bro. W. S. Priest, of Atchison, Kan., writes the following to correct a false report which has gone forth concerning some statements of his in a card to Mrs. Nation:

Will you allow me space in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to say that I have received some gratuitous advertising on account of a report of an opinion of mine, expressed to a reporter of this town, and sent broadcast, and that some excellent brethren have written me letters using epithets which exhibit, to say the least, a not very Christian spirit. I simply expressed my opinion to the reporter that Mrs. Nation is not pursuing the best method to rid the state of the saloon, an abomination which all of us are doing our best to get rid of. When I was asked if she was a member of the Christian Church I laughingly said, "O, I guess not," or "I hope not," or something of that kind. I am glad to say that my position, which is thoroughly understood by the church which I serve, the W. C. T. U. of Atchison, and the citizens generally, is identical with all these people. I was also glad to read your vigorous editorial in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. If anybody thinks I expressed strong convictions on the subject, they should read your editorial. I do here and now reaffirm my opinion that Mrs. Nation is not following the wisest method to rid the state of the liquor traffic. She, and all of us, should go after the officers of the law. May I be pardoned for saying that I have been an ardent Prohibitionist for nearly twenty-five years; that I helped to win Kansas for St. John in 1884, and that perhaps I have done as much real and permanent good for the cause of temperance as Mrs. Nation and some other folks? It seems to me that out of the labor of this mountain a very small mouse is being born. The language of the interview was that of the reporter and not of myself. WALTER SCOTT PRIEST.

—The following extract from a personal letter from Bro. R. S. Smedly, of Oklahoma, presents a vivid picture of the method of the evangelist in building up the weak churches on the frontier:

We go out among a people unorganized but the brethren uphold a meeting, organize them and once per month see them until we can get some one to serve them. The work is loaded down with sacrifices of personal comfort. We can't say to a people so situated, "how much will you pay us to hold a meeting?" If we did the door would be closed at once for good. We go to them, study forenoons, visit from house to house afternoons, preach nights, receiving the free-will offerings. We have worked hard for two weeks and received only $1.61. We joyfully go to the next trusting in the Lord. I went to one congregation who had a stockade church, that is, the sides and ends were made of logs stood up, the logs chinked and daubed between, shingle roof and good floor. The only elder had resigned last July, stating as a reason that he had sinned against the Holy Ghost. In January we held a meeting and set them in order. When we went into the neighborhood we were told there were three men who had sinned against the Holy Ghost, and two belonged to our church. They claimed no forgiveness for this sin. I convinced one of our brethren he had a wrong view of the Scripture referred to. In two days I start to the front again. R. S. SMEDLY.

—An editorial in The Toronto World makes a striking suggestion in the direction of Christian union. It comments on an address made by Dr. Langtry before the Toronto ministers, in which the speaker showed great zeal for unity, but after all had no scheme to propose except that all other denominations join the Church of England. The World says:

The World itself is somewhat an enthusiast on the question of church unity and we might venture to place our own scheme alongside that of Dr. Langtry. Our scheme for unification is to place a copy of the authorized Bible in the pulpit of every church and to declare that Bible to be the constitution of the church. The individual members of any church might differ on minor points, but they would be all agreed on the great fundamental principle which recognizes the Bible as the constitution of the Christian Church. Absurdly simple as is Dr. Langtry's scheme of unification we claim for ours still greater simplicity. We simply put a certified copy of the Bible in every pulpit and say that is the church. Dr. Langtry wants more. In addition to a certified copy of the Bible in the pulpit, he would have a bishop in robes seated on an Episcopal chair. The Bible and the bishop, in Dr. Langtry's opinion, ought to conjointly form the constitution of the church. Indeed, if you look more closely into the doctor's scheme you will see that his bishop holds a Prayer Book in his hand, and this Prayer Book is as much a sine qua non of the scheme as is his Lordship's certificate of Episcopal descent. In order to equip a unified church under Langtry's scheme this plant, therefore, is necessary:

1. One certified Bible.
2. One bishop in robes attesting his Episcopate genuineness.
3. One authorized Prayer Book.

The simpler any machine is made the better will it work. The World claims that its unification machine is simplicity itself. It is as simple as an electrical dynamo. It has only one working part. We have no fear of the results of a test between our up-to-date motor and Dr. Langtry's complicated, reciprocating mechanism.

This scheme has a familiar sound to our ears. It is what a million or so of us in this country have been advocating for a long while, but the scheme is too simple to patent and we claim no exclusive right. We congratulate The Toronto World on having made its discovery.

TALL CORN

doesn't come by accident. A fertile soil and careful cultivation are necessary to produce the towering stems and heavy ears.

Yet the farmer who understands that he can't have a healthy corn crop without feeding and weeding, seems to think that he can have a healthy body without either care or culture. But the body is built up just as the corn is, by the assimilation of the several chemical elements on which vitality depends. And what weeds are to the corn, diseases of the stomach and nutritive systems are to the body; they divert the necessary food supply from the proper channels, and the body becomes lean, sickly and ill-nourished.

The proper digestion and assimilation of food is a primary essential of health. By healing diseases of the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery increases the digestive and assimilative powers, stimulates the action of the blood making glands, and sends to every organ of the body the rich red-corpuscled blood on which physical vigor and vitality depend.

"I took two bottles of Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, for stomach trouble," writes Clarence Carnes, Esq., of Taylorstown, Loudoun Co., Va. "It did me so much good that I didn't take any more. I can eat most anything now. I am so well pleased with it I hardly know how to thank you for your kind information. I tried a whole lot of things before I wrote to you. There was a gentleman told me about your medicine, how it had cured his wife. I thought I would try a bottle of it. Am now glad that I did, for I don't know what I would have done if it had not been for Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets regulate the bowels and cure constipation.

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

We understand a FEW of our schools are using sectarian or union (so called) supplies, in order to save a few cents each quarter. Are you one of that number? Samples of our Supplies sent free.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING CO., ST. LOUIS.

The Lesson Helper for 1901 is the most thorough and complete commentary for Christian Sunday-schools published, with the single exception of the Lesson Commmentary, and it has many of the features of that work. The Keokuk Church.

It was my privilege to begin a meeting with the church in Keokuk, Ia., A. F. Sanderson, pastor, Jan. 3rd, and continue over two Lord's days. During this time there were 36 additions, 31 being by confession of faith. I was obliged to leave on account of other engagements, but the pastor continued the meeting a few days, until H. A. Northcutt could come to his assistance. At this writing, the meeting is still going on.

A. F. SANDERSON.

A. F. Sanderson is a brother of Eugene Sanderson, Dean of the Bible-school in Oregon. Born July 24, 1866, near Bloomfield, Ia., he worked his way through college, graduating at Oskaloosa in 1890. After a few months at Drake University, he was chosen one of the state evangelists of Iowa, in September, '91, continuing till March, '92, when the church at Ottumwa requested his release to become pastor there. Four years of faithful work in Ottumwa added 200 to the membership, and greatly improved the building.

From Ottumwa he went to Keokuk, under the advice of A. M. Haggard, then state secretary, and he has done a still more remarkable work here. He found a membership of less than 100, a Sunday-school of 40, a very poor frame building in a hollow, and a debt equal to the value of the property. A new house, worth $14,000, has been built in a fine location, 400 added to the church, a Sunday-school of 275, and an Endeavor Society of 110. The pastor has been assisted during this time in meetings by A. M. Haggard, James Small, J. A. L. Romig, F. G. Tyrrell and H. A. Northcutt. Hedrick, Keota, and Middletown, Ia., all have churches that were organized by Mr. Sanderson, and have built houses of worship. From weakness and obscurity, the Keokuk church has grown into power and prominence, and its career has just begun.

Kentucky Notes.

A number of changes have occurred in Kentucky pulpits this year, and as a result, a number of pulpits are vacant.

M. D. Clubb, formerly of Chattanooga, Tenn., has accepted the position of field agent for the College of the Bible. His work was opened with a rally of the Lexington churches in the Broadway Church of that city, on the night of Jan. 20, which was largely attended. An earnest effort will be made by him to largely increase the endowment fund of this institution during the present year.

Among the preachers who have recently removed from this state, none perhaps will be more missed than Wm. Ross Lloyd, who is now preaching for the First Church of Youngstown, Ohio. He has held several very successful pastorates in Central Kentucky, the last one being at Richmond. We regret very much to see him leave this state.

R. H. Lampkin, who recently resigned at Athens (near Lexington) and accepted a call to Cripple Creek, Col., was married on Jan. 22, to Miss Lavine Edelen of Bardstown. Bro. L. is one of our most energetic young preachers and we predict for the church at Cripple Creek a successful year's work under his leadership. Our best wishes follow them to their western home.

The Year Book gives Kentucky 885 churches, 455 ministers and 112,000 members. These churches gave last year $8,315.34 for Foreign Missions. This is the largest amount received from the churches of any state, as churches, so Kentucky is the banner state in this respect.

John S. Sweeney, who was minister at Paris for such a long time, has just been appointed postmaster of that place. The church at Paris is greatly prospering under the leadership of their new preacher, Lloyd Darsie. He is now in the midst of a successful meeting with home forces, with 18 added at last report. Preparations are now being made for the erection of a beautiful new house of worship there this spring.

We congratulate the Home Board upon being able to secure the services of Dr. Josiah Strong for two addresses at the Congress of Disciples which meets in Lexington, March 26-28. His subjects will be, "The Twentieth Century City," and "Readjustments to Meet New Industrial and Social Conditions." The congress ought to be largely attended. Come! You will be given a cordial welcome by the Lexington churches.

CHRISTIAN CHURCH, KEOKUK, IOWA.

H. C. Bowen has resigned at Bellevue and Dayton and accepted calls to the churches at Augusta, Brooksville and Minerva. He will no doubt be succeeded by W. J. Loos at Bellevue, Bro. L. having given up the work at Ghent and Carrollton.

J. M. Helm, of Vanceburg, is in a good meeting with the church at Concord, Lewis Co.

Hazel Green Academy, of which Prof. W. H. Cord is principal, now has an enrollment of 238 pupils. The highest number of scholars previous to the present session was 169. This institution is under the control of the C. M. B. M.

H. H. Lloyd has succeeded W. F. Rogers at Springfield and Bardstown. The latter is now living in Louisville (Parkland) and preaching for several country churches.

We are glad to report President J. W. McGarvey of the College of the Bible, who has been quite ill for several weeks, as convalescent. This, we know, will be good news to his host of friends and admirers all over our country.

The writer is recovering from a severe attack of pneumonia, which has kept him "shut in" now for nearly six weeks. His pulpit, however, has been regularly filled, through the kindness of neighboring preachers. He has just entered upon his second year at Midway, under favorable circumstances. Fifty-two were added during the past year.

FOR CHILDREN

Nothing, that comes in a bottle, is more important for children than Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil.

And "important" means that it keeps them in even health. Whenever they show the least disturbance of even balance of health, it promptly restores them.

It is to be used as a food, whenever their usual food does not quite answer the purpose of food.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

Washington State Notes.

I close my first year's work with the First Christian Church at Seattle next Lord's day. During the year we have had 97 additions at regular services, 12 by baptism and 85 by letter and statement. Among these 85 are many splendid workers from our eastern churches. Besides keeping up the regular expenses of the church, we have bought a choice lot for $1,600. We are still worshiping in our rented house, which is a deserted Swedish Baptist church, in a very poor locality, but we are putting forth our best efforts to raise money for our building fund. We must have a house of our own on our new lot before the close of the present year. In spite of our bad location our Sunday morning audiences are fine and the evening audiences are good. We have the largest C. W. B. M. auxiliary in the state, about 50 members, and a fine Mission Band. The church is united and harmonious in its work and worship. To those who know the past conditions of the work here, this speaks volumes.

Bro. A. C. Vail is the pastor of our church at Latona, near the State University. Their work is also in a very prosperous condition. They have outgrown their house and have bought some choice lots near the University grounds and expect to build in the near future. Bro. Vail will receive the A. B. degree from the University this year.

Good reports come from the work at Ballard where Miss Wilcox ministers. Bro. W. S. Crockett, of North Yakima, is to assist her in a meeting soon.

It would be impossible to describe the growth of the city of Seattle. It is said to be the most prosperous city in the country just now. It does seem to me our brethren in the east do not appreciate the passing opportunities in this western country. Great cities are growing up here and the strategic points are being captured by the denominations, because they have the wisdom to take advantage of the open door. We know how difficult it is now to build up in Chicago and New York. The opportunities have been lost and our cause must be the loser from it for all time. The same thing is being repeated in Seattle and the cities of the coast. Our good sisters of the C. W. B. M. are doing mission work among the Chinese of Portland and I understand are planning for similar work in San Francisco, while our best church in Portland is worshiping in a shack and our cause in San Francisco is battling for existence. Give us churches and adequate means of work and we will look after the Chinese and the slums.

Can Old Preachers be Made Useful?

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—I rise to thank you for the suggestion which you make in the last issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST concerning old preachers. You intimate that in the coming century old preachers may be made much more useful than they have been in the past.

I wish to emphasize this suggestion, and I do so because I am in a position which will excuse me from even the suspicion of selfish motives. I do not reckon myself among the old preachers, nor do I expect ever to be old. And even should I now be regarded as among those who have passed the dead line, it is still true that I am not seeking for a place, and, consequently, can not be accused of pleading my own cause. I have always had more work to do than I could accomplish, and am still crowded with what is equal to two men's work.

I am not, therefore, pleading my own cause, but I am looking at the matter from the standpoint of the preacher's interest and also from a sympathetic feeling in behalf of the old ministers. I honor the work they have done, and I protest against treating them with scant respect and especially with neglect.

I am led to write this protest against what seems to be a prevailing custom, not only on account of what you have spoken so timely and so earnestly, but also for the reason that I have read this week, in one of our papers, a call from a church for a pastor, accompanied by the statement that no one over fifty years old need apply. Of course, that fixes definitely the dead line; and this statement is, I think, about the measure of the general notion concerning usefulness of preachers. Fifty years may be regarded as the limit of the preacher's usefulness.

Now, is this estimate correct? Must the preacher be shot when he reaches the age of fifty? In the case referred to, the preacher over fifty years old can have no chance whatever. Is this a wise conclusion with respect to the usefulness of ministers of the gospel?

Let no one misunderstand me. I am the friend of young preachers. No man rejoices in their usefulness more than I do. No man is more hopeful of our rising ministry than I am. I am now devoting the most mature, and, I think, useful years of my life largely to the training of young men for the ministry. I know quite well that the hope of the Church very largely rests with our young men. At the same time, it is true that we cannot do without our old men. I am willing to admit that there are old preachers and old preachers. Some of them do not use their opportunities wisely and well. A few of them do not keep up with their day and generation. They do not study. They rely mainly upon their past accumulation of material. They preach their old sermons over and over, without recasting them or in any way bringing them into line with modern conditions. In all such cases the preacher will find himself unable to interest or even instruct many of those who hear him. The consequences need not be foretold. He will soon lose his grip upon his audiences and his usefulness will speedily come to an end.

However, it often happens that this very state of things is brought about by neglecting the old preacher. It is nearly always fatal to a preacher's usefulness if he is kept out of a place for any length of time. Old men do not grow any more certainly than young men without exercise. The cure for sterility in both old and young is work, unceasing, laborious work. No man will grow if he ceases to labor. It often happens that a preacher, when at the age of fifty or sixty, finds himself without any special place to fill. He immediately ceases to study, and when called to preach on some particular occasion, he pulls up an old sermon which he may have prepared twenty years before, and then preaches it practically as he d the first time he used it, though without the freshness and vigor which marked its first proclamation. The audience is not slow to detect this old patch on the new cloth. No wonder he is not wanted to continue his preaching at that place.

But this does not fitly describe the average old preacher. Many of our old men keep up with the times, and most of them would do so if they had sufficient encouragement. But when a man feels that his usefulness is at an end, he loses courage, and this fact alone is sufficient to make his after life barren of any valuable results.

Now, what I want to say is this: The churches have it in their power to keep most of our old men in the field as long as they are able to work at all; and it is my settled conviction that a man's usefulness in the ministry ought to be greater between fifty and seventy years of age than during any other period of his life. He ought to know a great deal more and he ought to be a better man at that age than when he was younger. And if this conclusion is correct, then somebody must be fearfully responsible for the present state of things. Furthermore, it seems to me to be a crying shame that announcements should be made in our religious papers that men over fifty years of age need no longer apply for a place in the ministry. The shame of the thing is emphasized by the brazen effrontery with which it is proclaimed.

While I heartily sympatize with your friendly suggestion with respect to the old preachers, I fear your prophecy will not be fulfilled. The present rage for sensational preaching; for a gospel that can be tasted on the tongue; for a ministry that will be wide-awake to the nervous prostration of spiritual life which prevails in many of our churches, and that will feed this state of things with a sort of galvanic battery from the pupit, rather than smash it with the thunderbolts of divine truth, will probably make it impossible for any decided reformation to prevail until we have reached the bottom of our present degradation. Sometimes things have to get worse before they get better. I fear the worst has not been reached yet, as regards the matter under consideration.

Texas Letter.

The corner stone of the Dallas library building was laid Jan. 16. The ceremonies were imposing and the crowd was large. The best people of the city rejoice that our remarkable commercial prosperity is to be connected with intellectual culture. The site is possibly the very best that could have been chosen, and the structure is all that could be desired. Soon it will stand an ornament to the city, the pride of our people, and an inspiration to all, especially our boys and girls, to strive for a higher education. It will also be a constant reminder to men of wealth that, like Carnegie, they too, while living, may build their own imperishable monuments.

Here is a center shot from the Dallas News, worthy of universal circulation: "The thirty-seven senators who dodged the vote on the canteen amendment to the army bill probably did so by dodging into the canteen closet of the senatorial establishment."

J. A. Shoptaugh, of Valley Falls, Kan., is seeking a milder winter climate. His wife is a successful assistant pastor, and Texas would be pleased to have them stop with us.

S. K. Hallam has resigned at Roswell, New Mexico, and for the present is stopping at Ft. Worth. Bro. Hallam is too well and favorably known to be idle very long.

J. A. Clark, father of Addison and Randolph Clark, died at Tharp's Springs Jan. 12, in his 86th year. Bro. Clark was one of the bold pioneers who came to this country in an early day, and made possible the rich blessings which we now enjoy. Perhaps the most notable work of his life, aided by his two noble sons just mentioned, was the founding of Add-Ran University.

Z. T. Sweeney has been secured as "chief lecturer" for our next Lectureship at Waco in December, and we can assure him of a hearty welcome at the hands of our people. We also congratulate the committee in the selection they have made.

That wonderful oil well at Beaumont, of which mention was made in my last letter, has developed into what is claimed to be the most remarkable well on the continent. For several days the flow could not be controlled, and as the result there is an immense lake of oil near by. It is said that an analysis shows that the oil is of the grade known as "fuel oil," and cannot be used for illumination. We have a vigorous young church in Beaumont, cared for by our State Board, and Pastor Hamner is hopeful.

The church in Cleburne has divided, and a number of brethren who have long thought a down-town location was needed, have obtained letters and organized the Central Church near the business portion of the city. We hope this move may prove to be a blessing to both sections of the church and a great blessing to the city.

Chas. Reign Scoville is to be with us in another meeting from Sept. 8 to Oct. 6.

Cotner University Notes.

The winter term has opened with bright prospects. The increase in the number of students is encouraging.

On Christmas day Prof. Charles R. Travis and Miss Minnie M. Miller, of East Lincoln, were married. Prof. and Mrs. Travis make their home in Bethany. In addition to the regular work of the Department of Vocal Music Prof. Travis is making a specialty of training singing evangelists, a work for which his own successful experience so well fits him.

The new Financial Secretary, H. G. Wilkinson, has moved to Bethany. It will be remembered by those who attended the Kansas City Convention that Mrs. Wilkinson is the author of "Boggess' Ride." Miss Maud Worthing, who recited that poem at the convention, is one of the new students.

The friends of the University are still remembering the library. Prof. H. L. Willett and Prof. W. D. McClintock, of Chicago University, have sent us over fifty volumes, while Prof. Errett Gates, of the Disciples' Divinity House, of Chicago, Prof. Fred S. Henry, of Henry College, Texas, and Mr. John Winters, Western Agent of the American Book Company, are among the recent contributors. Other gifts are promised. All communications as to the library should be addressed to Prof. Grace E. Young, Librarian.

Dr. Sarah Green, of Hastings, has recently loaned to the University a very valuable microscope—one of the best in the state. It is hoped that this may later become the property of the institution.

State Senator Currie, of Custer county, has accepted the invitation to deliver the Patriots' Day oration this year.

In the local oratorical contest the oration entitled "The Pre-eminence of the Anglo-Saxon," by Hugh L. Lomax ('03), took first place.

By a recent arrangement with the Bethany Board of Education, the University now has a chance for practice work for its advanced normal students in the public schools. By this means a much larger number of young people may be sent out over the state who have had the advantages of both normal training and the Christain training afforded by our schools.

On the evening of Feb. 1 Pres. Aylsworth delivered a lecture on "Rambles Abroad" under the auspices of the Mathesian Literary Society. Much pleasure and profit was derived from the vivid description of what he saw and heard in crossing the sea and journeying through Scotland and England.

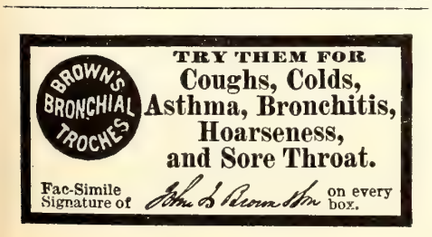
That Wichita Matter.

MY DEAR BROTHER:—While you are, in my judgment, generally correct in your observations, I am compelled to dissent from one observation or rather comparison in that case of anarchy in Wichita.

Now there may be some indications or symptoms of anarchy in the actions of those women but where there is one symptom in their "rash act" there are one hundred and one in the corrupt officials who have as you suggest allowed and sanctioned the illegitimate saloons to run in open defiance of law.

Your serious mistake, however, lies in the direction of your comparison of things that are not equal.

In the Leavenworth case the negro, being a citizen, had protection and the right of trial by jury both under the constitution and the laws of the state. But in the Wichita case the property of the saloon-keepers had neither, because they are running in "open defiance of the law," hence their property is subject to confiscation, or might be declared "contraband of war."



Therefore, while we should respect and defend the rights of the negro, I can't see any ground for respect and defense for these illegitimate saloon-keepers or their illegitimate property, for they are from start to finish outlaws, intruders, and have not the slightest claim to protection either under the constitution or the laws of the state. I would just as soon undertake the defense of the property of horse thieves or highwaymen as the property of these infamous saloon-keepers for, obviously, in law they are on exactly the same ground.

Fraternally, H. W. ROBERTSON.

Blackwell, Okla., Jan. 28, 1901.

[1. That the officials who fail to enforce the law are guilty of greater wrong and are more to be censured than the women who destroy the property of saloon-keepers, has been clearly stated in these columns. 2. The distinction which our brother seeks to draw between the colored criminal who had a right to a trial by jury under our constitution, and the property of saloon-keepers, does not seem to us valid. Even one's property, in this country, can not be taken from him "without due process of law." Even "horse thieves and highwaymen" are entitled to trial under the law, and the law-breaking saloon-keepers have the same right. Our correspondent lays down a very remarkable principle of law when he says that the property of a law-breaking but untried person is "subject to confiscation or might be declared 'contraband of war.'" He would do better to stick to his comparison between the Kansas saloon-keepers and "horse thieves and highwaymen." That is sound and logical. But when he himself compares the saloon-keepers with highwaymen he ought not to think us unzealous in the cause of temperance when we compare them with a murderer.

The thing most important to do in Kansas, we should say, would be to bring public sentiment to bear on these "corrupt officials" to compel them to enforce the law or resign. Why should the enlightened people of Kansas elect "corrupt" men for officials? If these women can bring about an agitation that will result in the enforcement of the law, then some permanent good may be accomplished, but not otherwise.—EDITOR.]

Letter from Jeu Hawk.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I arrived here safely with the family Nov. 29, after a pleasant trip crossing the Pacific, with the exception of a severe accident that came near sending us all to the bottom of the sea. Our steamer, the Empress of Japan, collided with a sailing vessel about 3:30 A. M., the next morning after we left Victoria, B. C. We all looked for the worst then, but our heavenly Father has a work for us to do in this city, so He saved us all. Our steamer had to return to Victoria for temporary repairs, which kept us there five days late. Some one was to blame for the accident, because it was a case of pure negligence. No doubt there will be lots of covering up of the case when the board of inquiry meets for the purpose of finding out the responsible ones. I presume you must have read a great deal of exciting news about Quong Tong province soon after we left the States, for many missions in the country have been destroyed by mobs and robbers in this state. Before I made the trip to my native home, many Christian Chinamen urged me not to go to the country with the family. I thought I would try to go to see my folks myself, leaving my family with a Christian family here. So I did, and just returned here yesterday morning with my father after a stay of 13 days in the country visiting relatives and places where missions had been destroyed. I visited four destroyed missions and asked the people who live around there why the missions were destroyed. Most of them told me that it was a case of pure robbery on the part of those that took a hand in it. It was not because they hate the missions more than anything else, but because they could take the things from the missions much quicker and with no resistance. The false reports circulated throughout Quong Tong province had a great deal to do with the outbreak against the missions. It was reported that the foreign army in the north was totally destroyed, that hereafter no missionary would be allowed to come to China to preach Christ, that the Powers were forced to agree not to interfere with any Chinese affair henceforth. But the people have now learned to the contrary, so they have quieted down. All destroyed properties will be paid for by the district judges and townsmen where trouble occurred. I have seen the Baptist preacher who accompanied the different officers that went to see every place destroyed. I knew this preacher while in America. He was a schoolmate of Mrs. Jeu Hawk. Everything is quiet now and while I was in the country going from one place to another I heard nothing against Christian people or foreigners. I did not preach in the public way during my short stay at home this time, but I believe I have done a better work, more effective, through my medical knowledge while there. I talked to the young men and boys every night in their evening resort, that is, where they sleep at night, about Christ and his love. Seven years ago everybody worshiped idols, now the night watchman's station has none. It is wonderful to see how the word of the Lord has grown in this small town. I have treated about 60 patients of various kinds while at home and received compensation just enough to pay 203 rides on the street car in America, besides I have to give the medicine free. I do this for the sake of Christ and for the advancement of his kingdom in China. I talked to every case that came for treatment about Christ and his healing power and urged them to follow and believe in him; so even in this unfavorable season they hear the word of God gladly and thanked me kindly and highly for the kind services rendered them. Is there any brother or sister in America or elsewhere who has any confidence in me that wants to help me to do some missionary work in Southern China? I am sure I am now in a position to be able to do something for Christ in our home land if I only can get some help from our American brethren and sisters. I don't want you to support me. I only ask you to furnish me medicine, instruments and rent for say two or three years. I have partially rented a second floor, No. 41 Queen's Road Central, for $35 a month Mexican money. I intend to make two rooms out of it, one for office and the other for the family. I may find another place. Everything is so dear in Hong Kong. I am asked to give free clinic daily in Alice Memorial Hospital. I am thinking of giving ree clinic daily in my office after I open it. To say the least, brethren and sisters, I have no money to do all this. Who wants to help in this grand and noble work? If I can get no help from America I may have to give up all my plans and make up my mind to do it in some other way or go back to America. We are willing to remain here and sacrifice our lives for the Master in this quiet way for the redemption of our people. May God bless us all and help us all to do his blessed will is the prayer of your fellow laborer in the Lord.

Yours in Christ,

JEU HAWK.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

DAYTON, O., Feb. 4.—Two hundred and seventy to date here; 108 additions in last eight days; 31 yesterday. This is a noble pastor and people. WILSON & HUSTON.

Colorado Springs, Colo., Jan. 30.—Last Sunday evening closed my first ten months with the First Christian Church of this city. During this time we have received just 100 additions to this church. Our C. W. B. M. numbers about 80 members. Our Endeavor Society numbers 85 members. Our Sunday-school has an enrollment of about 350. Our Women's Union is something unique and worthy of explanation. Its membership consists of every woman member of this church and such other women as are recommended by one of the divisions of the union and accepted by the whole union at its regular meeting. Its object is to promote acquaintance and sociability among the people of the church; to raise money and to advance the spirituality of the members. There are no dues. The union is divided into five divisions. The divisions are geographical, not alphabetical. The officers of the union are a president, five vice-presidents, secretary and treasurer. These officers also constitute an executive committee. The five vice-presidents are each a president of one of the divisions, which in addition has its secretary and treasurer. The different divisions meet in their respective sections of the city once a week for three weeks, and all of the members of the different divisions meet at the church the first Tuesday in each month. At this union meeting reports are heard from all of the different divisions through their secretaries and treasurers. All money is turned over to the treasurer of the union. I have tried many plans for the enlistment of the unenlisted, and I can say that this is the greatest success of anything I have ever before tried. Our Christian Endeavor Society is supporting and educating a Japanese girl and an Indian boy. They pay $60 a year for that purpose. We are paying about $400 a year for the support of the Colorado state work. We take all of the regular missionary collections; but we are opposed to allowing any of our societies or any one else to run in special days on us. This will explain why several letters received from different sources in the past six months have been unanswered. Our people are dwelling together in love and union. Interest in all departments of our work was never better. We are happy.—F. N. CALVIN.

Florence, Colo., Jan. 28.—Nine additions by letter during the first month of the century. Missouri is coming west.—DAVID LYON.

DeLand, Fla., Feb. 2.—DeLand has what might be called two missions now in the work being done at Daytona and Malabar. These points are on the east coast and promise to develop into splendid centers from which the truth may radiate. I visit Daytona once each month, the last Lord's day, to meet with the band of Disciples and friends. Visiting brethren will find a cordial welcome extended them if they will meet with the saints in "an upper room" in the Seminole Block, Beach St. The band of believers at Malabar broke the ground for their church home on the last day of January. The lives of faith which these brethren manifest are inspiring. There were four baptized at the former and three at the latter place this week.—F. J. LONGDON.

Arcola, Ill., Jan. 30.—Bro. Simpson Ely closed a four weeks' meeting here last Sunday with 47 additions, 37 by confession and baptism, two of whom were from the Methodist, one from Presbyterian, one from Catholic, ten by letter and statement, two of these from New Light, one from Baptist and one from Methodist. The church here is strengthened in all its departments.—L. T. FAULDERS.

Clay City, Ill., Feb. 1.—Our meeting at Lawrenceville closed Wednesday night with 26 added. Bro. Groves did some fine preaching. We begin here Monday night, 4th, with Walter Kline, pastor. We are drilling chorus and getting things ready.—C. M. HUGHES, singer.

Springfield, Ill., Feb. 1.—Our meeting, with Bro. J. M. Lowe, of Des Moines, assisting, is just begun. Bro. Lowe shows himself to be a clear, logical thinker and we are assured of excellent sermons.—J. E. LYNN, pastor.

Windsor, Ill., Feb. 1.—Eight additions in January at regular appointments; three at Ash Grove, one at Arthur and four at Humbolt.—A. H. HARRELL.

Bedford, Ind, Jan. 28.—We had three confessions here yesterday. Our new church is nearly ready for the frescoer. A member of the church at Union City, Ind., will do the work.—JAMES SMALL.

Crawfordsville, Ind., Jan. 29.—The new Christian Church at Fortville, Ind., was dedicated by F. M. Rains the third Sunday in December; over $4,500 raised. Structure cost about $8,000. Church auditorium, Sunday-school room, Bible-class room, choir platform, ladies' parlor, kitchen, baptistry, robing rooms; everything modern. W. H. Kerr is entering upon his eleventh year as pastor. Bro. T. H. Kuhn, the state evangelist, followed the dedication with a meeting lasting four weeks with 42 added to the church.—W. H. KERR.

Sullivan, Ind., Jan. 29.—Closed a short meeting last night which resulted in 34 additions, 33 baptisms. Bro. Robert Sellers of Indianapolis, preached two weeks. We all greatly enjoyed his stay with us. He is a good preacher and a clean, straight man.—M. W. YOCUM.

Terre Haute, Ind., Feb. 1.—Last night I closed a meeting at Cayuga with two added; one by confession and one from New Lights. L. V. BARBRE.

Ames, Ia.—Jan. 29.—During January we had one addition by confession and baptism and four letters. All departments of church work are prospering nicely. Thirty-five copies of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST are received here.—JAMES R. MCINTIRE.

Creston, Ia., Jan. 30.—We have just closed a four weeks' meeting with 30 additions. I came here in November from Parsons, Kan., where I labored for almost four years. In our two and a half months' work there have been 40 additions to the church. Our Sunday-school is also delighted with its change in literature. We began with that of the Christian Publishing Co., the first of the year.—W. W. BURKS.

Mason City, Iowa, Feb. 4.—Five weeks' meeting closed last night with 29 added during the day. Total, 131.—HARLOW, Evangelist, and SARGENT, Pastor.

Mt. Ayr, Ia., Jan. 28.—Our meeting closed last night with 24 additions. J. M. Lowe was with us one month and did the preaching. We are certainly strengthened and edified by our work together.—L. C. SWAN, pastor.

Pleasantville, Ia., Feb. 3.—Two men, one at the head of a family, added to the church recently; the one by primary obedience, the other by re-instatement.—FORREST D. FERRALL, pastor.

Herrington, Jan. 29.—Just closed a meeting with home forces lasting four weeks. Bro. Matchett, of Abilene, was with us two weeks and gave us a splendid series of Bible sermons. The meeting resulted in 20 additions, 12 by confession, seven by letter and one reclaimed. —IMRI ZUMWALT.

Mayview, Kan.—A great meeting conducted by Bro. J. W. Babcock closed Jan. 21, resulting in 45 additions. The church with their pastor, Bro. John Fuller, had the field in good condition for a harvest. Last year Bro. Babcock held a meeting at Swan, Iowa, resulting in 125 additions.

Williamsburg, Kan., Jan. 28.—Closed a four weeks' meeting here last night with 15 additions; nine confessions, three from the Methodist, 3 from the Baptist and one from the Mormons. This was a hard field. We begin a meeting at Moran next Lord's day, Feb. 3. —KELLEMS AND SHAFFER.

Carthage, Mo., Jan. 29.—Four more additions at Jasper last Sunday. Two confessions, one from Congregationalists and one by letter.—M. S. JOHNSON.

Carthage, Mo., Feb. 1.—Our meeting has just closed. There were 56 additions, most of them grown men and women. Bro. Hill is no sensational evangelist. He preaches the truth in love, is a man of great spiritual power. Bro. Williamson, the singer, is a fine leader of song and a sincere Christian. I feel, after this meeting, that we have surmounted most of the obstacles and are now on the highway to permanent success. Grip and meetings in all the other churches did not prevent though they hindered much.—W. A. OLDHAM.

Gallatin, Mo., Feb. 2.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting near Murray, Ia., with five confessions. Bro. W. W. Wharton did the preaching. We intended to have a meeting in Murray but were forced to abandon it because of smallpox. I am now in a meeting with C. M. Wickham, of Sioux City, Ia. During the last year under his ministry the membership has more than doubled.—E. W. KERR, singer.

Joplin, Mo., Feb. 2.—Iowa did well to send Bro. M. S. Johnson to southwest Missouri. He lives at Carthage and preaches at Golden City and Jasper. He is a strong, pure, consecrated man. It was my pleasure to help him in a short meeting at Jasper in January with 11 confessions; one the Sunday before and four added the Sunday following. The church at Jasper is united and prosperous.—W. F. TURNER.

Kansas City, Mo.—R. Lin Cave meeting at the 7th and Garfield Christian Church closed last Friday night with 27 additions, mostly by confession. The meeting was well attended. The sermons were enjoyed by all and the church greatly benefited.—THOMAS J. DICKSON.

Maysville, Mo., Feb. 1.—I have been at home for several weeks making new illustrated songs. I have just finished the finest sets that I ever made. I go to Centerville, Ia., on the tenth for a meeting.—C. E. MILLARD.

Northview, Mo., Feb. 2.—This leaves me in a good meeting at Northview. Three added to date, two confessions; meeting one week old. Two hundred dollars raised for building; expect to build $1,000 house.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 4.—The following accessions were reported at the ministers' meeting to-day: Carondelet, one yesterday, four since last report; Fourth Church, one; Mount Cabanne, one; Beulah, one a week ago unreported.

In the first column are placed all reported indefinitely as "additions." In those reports where it is stated how many were received by baptism, and how many otherwise, we find that on an average about three-fifths are by baptism, applying this same proportion to the indefinite reports, taking three-fifths of the 3,095 we have 1857, adding the 1,418 known baptism, we have 3,275, which is a fair approximate of the baptisms for the month.

Union Star, Mo., Jan. 30.—The work at this place is moving along grandly. Our Endeavor Society is developing some fine workers. Bible-school attendance much the largest in town. Two added to church at last preaching service. Am in my fifth year here, half time now. Am giving one-fourth time to Fairview church. Fairview was my first charge. Began there 16 years ago. Began for one-fourth time at Bolckow last Lord's day. Fine audiences and interest.—W. A. CHAPMAN.

Hebron, Neb. Jan. 29.—A three weeks' revival meeting was closed here last Wednesday evening with 37 additions; 32 by obedience, three by letter and three reclaimed. The pastor was assisted in these meetings by Bro. Wm. Oeschger and Bro. W. F. Lintt. These brethren deserve great credit for their efficient and consecrated labors here. We are most sorry to note that Bro. Oeschger has accepted a call to Vincennes, Ind., and will leave our state. He has done a great work at Fairburg. Bro. Lintt's singing was splendid. We are now out of debt and in better condition in every way than ever before.—R. A. SCHELL, pastor.

Bowling Green, O., Feb. 1.—We closed the greatest meeting in the history of the Bowling Green Church last night. The first month of the new century was devoted to it; 68 lives were led to accept and obey Jesus Christ. Rev. C. W. Huffer, of Toledo, preached. His sermons were apostolic, simple, plain, convicting. He is a large man with a great heart and a rich mind. Mrs. Libbie Culp and the Netz quartette, of Toledo, assisted in the song service. Mr. Huffer made a host of loyal friends here. He was given a farewell reception and presented with a purse in grateful acknowledgment of his excellent service. There have been 93 additions since I began my ministry here eight months ago. Present membership 393. Prospects are bright.—JOHN RAY EWERS, pastor.

Brookfield, O., Jan. 30.—The Church of Christ at Brookfield just closed a seventeen days' meeting with 15 added; 12 confessions. Levi J. McConnell assisted one week.—ELLA P. MCCONNELL, pastor.

Cleveland, O., Jan. 28.—A preacher made the good confession at Hudson last night; one accession on Jan. 20, making a total of eight additions since last report. All departments of church work in a prosperous condition. The Bible Students Union, recently organized, moves forward grandly. Particulars of this plan to any minister for stamp. It will help you and your work, so write for it to-day.—D. L. BOND, Cleveland, O.

Lordstown, O., Jan. 30.—An excellent meeting was held in this place which lasted two and one-half weeks. With the one that united a short time before the meeting began, there were eight additions; four by letter and four by baptism. Bro. P. H. Wilson, of Austintown, did the preaching.—D. G. WAGNER.

Youngstown, O., Jan. 30—We had two confessions last Sunday at regular services at Central Christian Church.—W. S. GOODE.

T., 30 additions; Chickasha, I. T., 31 additions; Wankomis, O. T., eight additions, and am now in a meeting at Perry, with 28 additions to date and a crowded house. In 90 days 101 have been added as a direct result and 25 as an indirect result, making 126 in all.—JOHN N. STEVENS.

Lockhart, Tex., Jan. 26.—One addition at our regular service last Sunday.—J. J. CRAMER.

The Parson's Limit.

He'd been preaching and exhorting
For a score of years or so,
In a portion of the vineyard
Where the harvesting was slow;
Where the temporal inducement
For his ceaseless diligence
Was a promise of four hundred
For his yearly recompense.

Unrelenting was the ardor
He devoted to the cause,
And though slowly came the dollars
Still he labored without pause;
Till one day they came and told him,
As he kicked against the pricks,
That they'd raise their offered stipend
From four hundred up to six.

Then the good man sank exhausted
As he feebly made reply,
"Don't, I pray you, men and brethren,
Thus my patience overtry,
For to glean the four you'd promised
Hath so warped my vital store,
That 'twould kill me if you tasked me
To collect two hundred more."

—Boston Courier.

"Nurse Ann."

"That's what I call her," said Mrs. Vincent, whimsically. "Her real name is Ann Johnson, but I always think of her as 'Nurse Ann.' You see she is always on the hunt for the poor foundlings left on the steps of the church, and coaxing and nursing them into life and strength. Poor, neglected, puny little things, most of them, so tiny that anybody else would step on them and crush the 'wee bit' life out of them without seeing them, or kick them out into the gutter, thinking them simply small bunches of rubbish. I don't know how many poor infants 'Nurse Ann' has taken into her hospitable arms. There was Charlie Jones. He was one of the greenest-looking chaps you ever saw. At one of the revivals Charlie got warmed up in a queer, quiet way, and began to come out to the young people's meetings. One night he got enthusiastic and started 'I am thine, O Lord,' way off the key, horribly off. Some of the girls on a back seat snickered, and Charlie stopped singing and looked foolish; but the singing did not stop, for 'Nurse Ann' had struck in valiantly, and the others took it up and they rounded off two stanzas with a flourish. I was afraid it was all up with Charlie then, he was such a shy boy, but no, he came to the next meeting and actually started 'I am Thine, O Lord,' and started it strong and true. He told me afterwards that he was awfully ashamed that first night, but that Miss Johnson had told him that people most always broke down at first. Charlie sings in the choir now.

"Then there was Jessie French. She was one of the flightiest little butterflies you ever saw, and when she was announced to lead the young people's meeting, I just wondered what possessed 'Nurse Ann' to ask her. Well, the subject was 'Live Christians,' I believe. Jessie read the Scripture portion, made some blundering, hackneyed remarks about its being a privilege to be a Christian, and sat down looking as if she would like to run into a corner and cry. Then what did 'Nurse Ann' do but jump up and say that she felt just as Sister Jessie did about being a Christian, a real live Christian, and went on with such enthusiasm that poor Jessie looked surprised, then pleased and proud. She probably thought she must have spoken quite well, after all, if any one could get as much inspiration as that out of what she said. Well, what do you think? Jessie is as steady as a deacon now, and she has great influence with the other butterflies. But I'm positive that no one but Ann Johnson would have seen the infant spark of spirituality in Jessie French.

"Then there was another infant. Its name was 'Harmony,' and it belonged to the Ladies' Aid Society. It had always been sickly, and the ladies were so worn-out tending it and trying to keep it alive, that they finally bundled it up and pushed it out altogether. 'Nurse Ann' had never belonged to the Aid Society, but she joined now, and took the outcast in with her. She invited the Aid up to her house one night to what she called a 'Lavender Tea,' but it was really a christening of the reclaimed babe, and the ladies were so captivated with their own progeny in somebody else's arms, that they opened their arms and hearts and took it back again. It's a well-grown, vigorous child now. O, I couldn't begin to tell you of the neglected, starved, frozen, naked little waifs that woman has found around our church, and cherished and fed and warmed into healthy, happy helpers!

"Then Ann is so cute about strangers. If she sees one in church, she doesn't charge down the aisle with fixed bayonet to demand who the person is, and where she lives and what her previous condition of servitude, but she gets to her somehow; it generally is a her, you know, and shakes hands and speaks as simply and quietly as if the person were one of the family. One timid little woman told me she had been around to a number of churches, before coming to ours. At some they didn't notice her at all, at others they had such an active recruiting corps that she was actually afraid to go back. She comes to ours regularly and brings her husband and their three children. Don't you wish you had a 'Nurse Ann' in your church?"

I bowed meekly before the triumphant gaze of the Fairfield minister's wife, conceding, humbly, "I wish we had."—Minna Stanwood, in The Christian Intelligencer.

Marie Corelli's Tribute to the Queeen.

The Englishman is ever quick to sneer at woman's advancement in art, in literature, in scholarship and general intellectual ability, yet all the while 'tis a woman who rules him, and to a woman alone he is compelled to bend the knee! Off goes his hat at sight of the Queen! Cheers break from his throat at the proclaimed words, "the Queen!" "Knights and earls, and knaves and churls" bow their heads to "the Queen!" And with all peoples and in all countries there seems to be only one Queen to whom the article "the" can be applied without further modification. Other queens are qualified in their estate by the land over which they rule—as, for example, Queen of Italy, Queen of Greece, Empress of Germany, Empress of Russia; but when "the Queen" is said every one means England's Victoria. Of all queens the greatest, she is of all women the simplest, and herein gives matchless example to her sex. Above the splendors of her position and enthronement, she is pre-eminently woman in the sweetest and most womanly sense of the word—one who is gifted with quick, fine sympathies, and who has the supreme and exqusite tact which is, or should be, inherent in every true and unselfish feminine nature, combined with perfect self command, flawless purity and a strong, personal potency for good. Throned and crowned and sceptered in the fierce light of the whole world's constant observation, she yet remains as unaffected and sincere of soul as the most unsophisticated of her subjects and is in very truth one with them in the ordinary round of their daily existence.

Are we bereaved of our best beloved? So is the Queen. Have we suffered from evil-speaking and misjudgment? So has the Queen. And in our joys is she not equally one with us there?

In all quiet, natural and innocent pleasures the Queen is one with her subjects; it is only in social vice and folly that she takes no part.—Saturday Evening Post.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

Flowers in February.

The window-garden ought to be bright with blossoms during this month. Bulbs will be out in their glory, and most other plants will begin to do the real work of the season, so far as the production of flowers is concerned. Heretofore, they have been getting ready for this, and the season has not been brightened, to any great extent, with the beauty of blossoms.

Such plants as have not begun to make active growth should not be fertilized, hoping thereby to spur them to action. Wait until the plant shows an inclination to grow before you feed it rich food. This advice has been so often repeated that it has a trite sound, but it is important, and should always be observed. Only growing plants need fertilizers. Plants which are growing well should be fed well, to get them ready for the work of flower bearing. Do not make the mistake of giving large amounts of fertilizers at a time. Instead, give in small quantities, and repeat the application once a week. This keeps the development of the plants going on steadily, instead of spasmodically.

Watch your plants. Some which are growing rapidly will require a good deal of water. Others which are growing slowly will require but a small amount. The aim should be, at all times, to have the soil moist all through.

Give your plants all the sunshine they can get. Shift them about in the window so that each will have a chance at it. Arrange the large ones at the sides of the window, with the smaller ones between, so that none will be in the shadow of others. Turn them at least once a week to prevent a one-sided development. Great care must be taken to prevent injury from the depredation of insects, which seem to flourish more at this season than any other. Because of the high temperature of the ordinary living room and the dryness of the air, the red spider will be likely to make savage inroads on most plants if not promptly checked. Make it a point to shower every plant in the window-garden as often as possible—daily would be better than twice a week—and be sure that the water you apply reaches every portion of it. It is very necessary that the water gets to the lower side of the foliage, as there is where the spider is found in largest numbers. Water is the only thing that will rout this enemy, and you cannot use too much of it.

Many plants will need re-potting at this season, especially those which show an inclination to make strong growth, but are prevented from so doing because their pots are filled with roots. These should be shifted at once. If there is no potting soil at hand, apply some good fertilizer.

Bulbs will be coming into bloom now. In order to keep the flowers fresh as long as possible, it is well to put the plants in a rather cool room at night. If kept in the living room all the time the blossoms will be short-lived.

Hanging plants will need careful attention to keep them in health. Because they are rather hard to get at, as a general thing they are neglected. See that they are watered daily. If this is done there is no reason why they should not afford as much pleasure as the plants in the window, for they can be grown just as healthy. In nine cases out of ten of failure, the lack of sufficient water explains everything.

Many plants will require pruning at this season of rapid development. It should be given as soon as the need of it is seen. Allow no branch to get and keep the start of others. Cut it back, and keep it cut back until the others have caught up with it.

Air your plants every day when it is safe to do so. You need not fear their getting too much fresh oxygen. If some of your plants seem to be scarred on the foilage, as if an insect had gnawed them, or if there are light-colored spots on the darker green of the leaf, and the edges of many leaves turn brown and shrivel, you may be quite sure that a bacterial disease is at work among them. Bordeaux mixture, such as gardeners use, will, if promptly applied, check this disease. Unless something is done to kill it off at once, it will spread to all your plants, and weaken them to such an extent that they will amount to little during the remainder of the season, and some of the more delicate sorts will be so injured by its effects that they will die. The only objection to be urged against the use of this mixture is that it leaves a gray sediment on the foliage, which disfigures it considerably.—Home and Flowers.

Duet by Jenny Lind and Mr. Webster.

"Jennie Lind visited Washington during the winter of 1851, and sang in concert to a delighted audience. It chanced that on the evening of her appearance several members of the Cabinet and Senate were the guests at dinner of Bodisco, the Russian Minister, and the concert was half over when Webster and the other members of the party entered the hall. After the applause which greeted their appearance had subsided, the second part of the concert was opened by Miss Lind with Hail! Columbia. Webster, deeply moved by this patriotic air, arose at the close of the first verse, and added his rich, sonorous voice to the chorus. Without avail, his wife, who sat behind him, pulled at his coat-tail to make him sit down or stop singing. The volunteer basso joined in at the close of each verse, and none could tell whether Lind, Webster or the audience was most delighted. As the last notes of the song died away Webster arose, hat in hand, and made a profound bow to the singer. Jenny Lind, blushing at the honor, courtesied to the floor, while the audience applauded to the echo. Webster, not to be outdone in politeness, bowed again; Lind re-courtesied; the house again applauded; and this was repeated nine times.—Saturday Evening Post.

A Lame Compliment.

"Your name is a household word, Senator." This was the remark made in Chicago to Hon. Jonathan P. Dolliver, the new United States Senator from Iowa, during the recent presidential campaign, when a Republican committeeman, anxious to secure him for a speech, assured him that no man was better known or understood in the City by the Lake than the gentleman from Iowa. "Why, sir, no man is better loved by our people or more highly regarded than you," said the committeeman, rising in enthusiasm.

"If that's the case," replied the Senator, "I shall have to grant your request and speak again in Chicago."

"I shall have to advertise you," suggested the committeeman. "Of course I know your name—but, to be sure, I want to ask you. I suppose Joseph T. Dolliver is right?"

"And my name is a household word in Chicago!" responded the Senator.

"Yes, sir!"

"And my Christian name Joseph?"

"My mistake, Senator. I might have known better. It's John A. Dolliver."

"What!" exclaimed the Senator, "and my name is a household word in Chicago!"

"Oh, well," spoke up the committeeman blandly, "It's my mistake again. What is your Christian name, anyhow, Senator?"

"It's Jonathan, sir, and my name is a household word in Chicago!"

"My mistake, entirely," apologized the committeeman. "You know I am forgetful at times. I believe you spell your name D-o-l-a-v-o-r?"

"Hold on! Hold on!" shouted the Senator. "And my name is a household word in Chicago! Well! well! who'd a' thought it! I spell my name D-o-l-l-i-v-e-r."

"Of course, of course," soothingly chimed the committeeman. "Of course, nobody knew that better than myself. You are ex-Senator, I believe?"

It was then that Senaton Dolliver wilted, and whispered sadly: "And my name is a household word in Chicago!"—Saturday Evening Post.

The Four Big Brooms.

"Oh mother, why does the big wind blow.
And rattle the window-pane?
If I close my eyes to sleep, just so,
It wakes me up again;
If I hide my head beneath the spread,
You speak so soft and low
That I cannot hear what you have said,
Oh, why does the big wind blow?"

"Let us play, my darling, a merry play,
The winds are four big brooms
That sweep the world on a windy day
As Mary sweeps our rooms.
The south wind is the parlor brush
That sweeps in a quiet way,
But the north wind comes with roar and rush
On the world-wide sweeping day.

"Like Mary sweeping the halls and stairs
Is the work of the good west broom,
And the sweetest odors, the softest airs,
Float over the world's wide room.
But to-night the broom from the east is here,
And with it comes the rain,
Like John when he brushes the porch, my dear,
And hoses the window-pane."

The little boy laughed and cuddled close
In his warm and downy bed.
"I hear the broom and I hear the hose,
And I like them both," he said.
And so, though the rain may pelt away,
And the big wind loudly roar,
He remembers the wide world's sweeping day,
And thinks of the big brooms four.

What the Bird Said to the Man.

It was a house with a two-story piazza and pillars in front, and a saucy little sparrow was sitting on the top of a window frame as a big man opened the front door and beheld a lot of hay and straw on the floor of the piazza. He had had the caps of the windows so covered that he thought the bird people would not have space to build there, but little birdie looked down on the surprised intruder and cocked its head on one side, and began:

"Peep, peep! Chirp, chirp!"

"What right have you there?" said the man.

"What right have you to bother me?" replied the bird. "The Lord did not give you this ground; you stole it from the Indians. He gave you stone and wood and iron and lime, and you built your house. He has given me straw and hay, and taught me how to build my nest. Your Master said that the Heavenly Father feedeth the birds. And we are your first cousins. We work for you in clearing out the worms. If God feeds us, he means that we should have houses to keep us alive and to rear our young ones. You are not using the tops of these windows, and it is a noble shelter for us. Do not be so stingy. We are all God's tenants, and, if you will let us alone, we will pay our rent with sweet morning songs at the rising of the sun. And I heard you sing in church, in your Benedicite, 'O, all ye fowls of the air, bless ye the Lord; praise him, and magnify him forever.' I am told that you men in your horrid wars batter down and burn down each others' houses. We don't do that. Are you not ashamed to hurt our nests?"

"Well," said the man, "you have conquered. I will let you alone this year."—Rev. S. F. Hotchkin, in Sunday-school Times.

Victoria's Repartee.

Anecdotes of Queen Victoria will soon doubtless begin to usurp the place occupied by the countless stories of Lincoln and Edison. Some good ones are told of the childhood of the late queen, in the days when she was only the daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Kent with only a distant possibility of some day coming to the English throne. Her quickness of wit even at an early age is shown by several incidents connected with her visits to her uncle, King William IV.

On her fourth birthday she had a great excitement, no less than being bidden by her "Uncle King" to attend a state dinner party with her mother at Carlton House. She was dressed in a simple white frock looped up on the left sleeve by a miniature of the king, set in diamonds, His Majesty's birthday present to his little niece, whose vivacious manners seem to have delighted him vastly.

Several stories are told of the quick repartee which "Uncle King" received from his amusing little niece of Kent. During one of her visits to Windsor the King said: "Now, Victoria, the band is on the terrace waiting to play; what tune would you like to hear best?"

"'God Save the King,' if you please, uncle," she promptly replied.

And again, when asked what part of her visit had been the greatest treat, she discreetly said, "Oh, the ride in the carriage with you, uncle." On this occasion the King had driven her himself, which was doubtless a great event.

"Are you old enough to vote?" asked the tourist in North Carolina.

"I dunno erzactly what my age is, boss," replied the colored man. "But I can tell you dis: I allus was old enough to know better dan to try to vote."

Oh, the size of the sighs a fond lover sighs
When some flirt casts him off for a better,
Can never size up with the size of the sighs
Of the poor luckless one who may get her.

When a man doesn't know enough to make a living his wife always says he is too honest to succeed.

Hewitt: What are you raising whiskers for?

Jewett: Well I don't mind telling you that I am wearing a necktie my wife gave me.

"Uncle, which breed of chickens is the best?"

"Well, sah, de white ones is de easiest found, an' de dahk ones is de easiest hid after yo' gits 'em."

Barber: Did I ever shave you before?
Customer: Yes, a few weeks ago.
Barber: I don't recollect your face.
Customer: No, it's all healed up now.

The professor's wife: The professor is in the laboratory conducting some experiments. The professor expects to go down to posterity——

(From the laboratory): Br-r-r. Bang!

The visitor: I hope the professor hasn't gone.

"What do you think of the idea of broadening the present course of school studies?" asked the facetious friend of the family.

"I don't care how broad they make 'em," answered Tommy, "so's they don't lengthen 'em."

Trial Packages

FREE!

Rheumatism Cured by a Simple Remedy that you may Try without spending a cent. Cured many cases of 30 and 40 years' standing.

If any reader suffering from rheumatism will write to me I will send them, free of cost, a trial package of a simple and harmless remedy which cured me and thousands of others, among them cases of over 40 years' standing. This is a grand remedy, and want every afflicted reader to learn by actual test what marvelous power it has, and therefore will gladly send a sample free, even if more than 15,000 invalids should apply. Distressing cases of rheumatism, among them bedridden and crippled persons, were completely cured, of which I mention a few: A lady in Denham, Ind., writes that this remedy cured her, and she then cured 15 of her neighbors. In Lyon, Mo., it cured an old gentleman at the age of 82, who had been a sufferer for 40 years. In Seguin, Tex., it cured a case of 41 years' standing. Hon. Jacob Sexauer, of Fountain City Wis., was cured after suffering for 33 years and after having employed 7 physicians. Miss Emma Callender at 130 Oak St., Vincennes, Ind., was cured after she was given up to die. Rev. S. Sund of Harrisville, Wis., writes that the remedy had cured two members of his congregation, one who had suffered 15, and the other 25 years. Thousands of similar instances could be mentioned, showing that here is a remedy that can be relied upon. Write at once for a trial package, for it is an honest remedy which you can test before spending a cent. Address: JOHN A. SMITH, 1328 Germania Bldg., Milwaukee, Wis.

IX.—A High Cricket.

"How so?" said the tramp.

"Why," said the little girl, "don't you know you said you was a cricket and didn't believe all that the Bible said?"

"A cricket, Miss Prudence? No, Miss Prudence, I never used no such metterphor."

"If you mean me, Nap, I know what you met her for, because I just came up here and you had to meet me. But I know you said you was a cricket; a high one, too."

"No, Miss Prudence, critic was the word I employed. A high critic, what just jumps over such passages as is unpalatable, and lights on them as seems reasonable."

"Well that's like a cricket, ain't it, Nap? You know crickets skip just that way. But you see what it says; 'He that believeth not shall be damned.' And that's you."

"Well, I don't care if it is."

"Oh, Nap! but you don't want to be—damned?"

"It's immaterial to me," said Nap.

"Does that mean what it's made out of?"

"It means I don't care nothing about it."

"But Nap, if you're—damned, you know where you'll go, don't you?"

"Well, where will I go?"

"Don't you know where Dives went, Nap? That's the place. But if you don't know, I'll hunt it up in the Bible and read it, because it don't sound so bad reading it, as it does just talking it in your own talk like swearing-people do."

"Now, Miss Prudence, it happens that I does know about that there Dives, and I've heard him ran down till I'm sick and tired of it. What had Dives done to get into hell? That's the place you was trying to locate, warn't it?"

"Yes, that's it," said Pete.

"What had he done? He had dressed in clean linen, for one thing, and wore nice clothes, for another. And he et three square meals a day. And he had built hisself a beautiful house with a cupalo and a lovely handsome gate made of iron fillygree work, and he lived in it. Now that's what he done. Now let's see what he didn't do. He didn't feed a sick man, a beggar with sores, that was laid at that gate of his'n. But he didn't hender the crumbs from being took out to that beggar. And he didn't have Laz'rus drove away. Why! suppose you had a-lived in that lovely house, Miss Prudence; now you just look at it common-sense way, and talk to me, man to man. Supposed you'd lived in such a place and a beggar had been put at your gate with sores on him and the dogs a-scuffling and a-snarling around him, each dog a-trying to be first man to git to lick his sores—them was diffurnt dogs from what we has now, I reckon. And suppose you couldn't take your meals without seeing that beggar a-watching your spoon to see if you was dropping crumbs, and the dogs a-yelping and turmoiling so you couldn't hear yourself drinking your coffee? You'd a-sent for the marshal, that's what you'd a-done; or the police, if you'd lived where there was such luxuries. And take Dives after he'd done got to hell. He couldn't get nothing to drink. Did he put in his time thinking over his pains and wrongs? Not him. He spent his time a-petitioning them what had better traveling facilities to warn his kinfolks not to git into a like fix. He loved his family, he did, and he wanted um to have plenty of drinkin'-water by-and-by. And yet I've heard people sit up and discuss Dives, and abuse him, and show why he ought to be in hell, that wouldn't of drawed one dollar out of thur pocket to prevent a needy man (like me, Miss Prudence,) from want and privation!"

"But, Nap, do you mean to say Dives oughtn't to of been sent to—there?"

"No, mom. No man gets into hell because he lost his way. But what I means is, people that ain't no better needn't think to escape just because they know about Dives. My opinion is that the vast majority of mankind is all a-going there, Miss Prudence, so don't bother over me."

"Oh, Nap! Do you think that?"

"Yes, I do. Ain't most ever'body bad, some in spots, some all over? I tell you they's mighty few of my brother-mortals that I expect to miss when I arrives."

"Oh, Nap! And do you think I will go down there, when I die?"

"You, child? Why, bless your heart, no! You're safe. Now look a-here; le's make a bargain, Miss Prudence. When you're dead, you won't have a chance to do me a good turn. Bible shows that. So your chance is now. And I'm going to ask you to do something for me." He stopped suddenly and looked at her curiously.

"What is it, Nap? Haven't I done all I can? I've tried to get you to go away so mamma won't be bothered to death, but you can't, because you must have our money. And then I've tried to get you to be a Christian, but that ain't any use, it looks like. I'd better go back to the house now, I've got a big job on hands."

"And what's that, mom?"

"I've got to tell mamma about sliding out of my window, and all about it, because my seeing you is at an end. It won't be any use to come any more, and besides, mamma will make me promise not to do it again, so this is the last you'll see of me, Nap. But I'd like to know what made that 'Thump, thump, thump,' only I can't wait to hear. But what was it you wanted me to do for you?"

"Nothing, little lady, I was a fool to think of it. If you must go I'll escort you to the front door." Pete climbed down the ladder and the tramp followed stiffly. They paused in the barn door. "Look a-here, Miss Prudence, you may not a-thought it, but I've enjoyed your visits."

"Have you, Nap? I thought you was sorry both times."

"Well, I didn't want to soften. I hate to soften, Miss Prudence, I despise it. But you have just softened me, spite of myself. And it's done me good, and it takes me back to better days, the good days of my life when I wasn't a tramp but a barefooted boy, like you—I mean as to the bareness—and, bless your heart for a little daisy! And look here, Miss Prudence, before you go, le's shakes hands."

So they shook hands. "And that what I was going to ast you to do for me—tain't much—but I'm such a plumb fool I can't git it out of my mouth—look here, little girl, do you say 'Now I lay me down to sleep' most ever' night?"

"Oh, yes, ever' night."

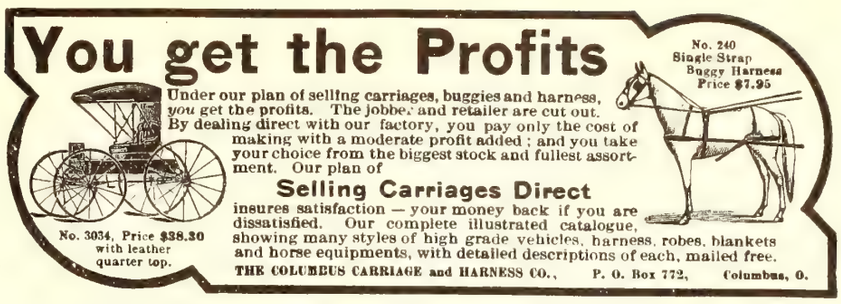
"And you winds up with 'Bless mamma and papa'?"

"Not papa. Don't you know papa's dead?"

"Yes, of course. But you bless mamma, don't you?"

"Of course; mamma and Madge and Jennie and me; that's the way I end up, 'For Jesus' sake,' you know."



"Well," said the tramp, "would you mind to put in 'And Nap'?"

"I'd be glad to."

"Then you say, 'And Nap.' Do what you can for me, Miss Prudence. You say 'And Nap,' right at the very tip end."

Pete nodded wisely. "So you'll be right next to 'For Jesus' sake'? All right, Nap. And I know He can make a good man out of you and a Christian, because He can do anything."

"Yes," said Nap thoughtfully, "but it's going to test Him hard."

"If you could only be here this winter morning and see for yourself you would no longer doubt me. Roses are blooming in our front yard and all nature is as far advanced in this lovely American summer-land as it will be in your cold eastern home by June.

Changes in Religious Thought.

An address by Dr. Daniel Dorchester, pastor of one of the M. E. churches of St. Louis, upon the above subject was the feature of the last meeting of the St. Louis Evangelical Alliance. The address was warmly received by an unusually large attendance of the Protestant ministers. Dr. Dorchester is a comparatively young man, and occupies one of the most influential pulpits in the west. His style is brilliant, but chaste, and his thought vigorous.

He called attention to the great changes in art and literature, declaring that Tennyson and Browning have driven out Dante and Milton; that no one longer has any respect for Milton's God, or Milton's hell or heaven. Truths do not change, but their expression does, and each new expression is tinged with the individuality of its author, and colored by the new time to which it is adapted.

His style is picturesque, not unlike that of N. D. Hillis, and he occasionally utters himself in epigram. For instance—"Ideals are engines, drawing men up to higher planes of living." "Jesus respected Jewish forms, and transcended them." This latter remark seems to be a most admirable statement of the attitude of Jesus to the then existing religious forms. He was no violent iconoclast, or mad revolutionary. It recalls the way some one characterized the work of Emerson: "He took down men's idols with such reverence that it amounted to an act of worship."

After paving the way by stating that to sneer at creeds is a mark of ignorance and narrow-mindedness, the speaker said: "At best it [the creed] is fossilized truth." The Bible was exalted above the creed. To quote again: "The Bible can have no authority, separated from the Christian consciousness." "Truth cannot be known as a quantity, but must be felt as a quality."

Puffed Up.

But She got Over It.

It sometimes takes nerve to quit a habit even after it is plain that the habit is ruining the health.

A little woman who was sick from coffee poisoning (and there are thousands like her) writes, "I had become almost a coffee fiend, drinking it at each meal, then afterward I was so nervous and weak that I would drink more coffee. I was a great sufferer with stomach and heart trouble.

"Everything I ate distressed me. There would be great puffs beneath my eyes and my hands and feet were terribly swollen. I was reduced to 108 pounds and was really slowly dying.

"A gentleman talked seriously to husband and myself about my giving up coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. He convinced me, from his own and others' experiences, that probably coffee was the cause of my trouble, so we tried Postum, but at first it seemed so flat and tasteless that I was almost discouraged. However, I looked at the directions on the package and found I had not been boiling it long enough, so I followed the directions exactly and had a clear, rich beverage, with a strong ring of good coffee, and very delicious taste.

"I began to sleep better and was not quite so nervous, my stomach and heart trouble slowly disappeared, and, of course, as I was getting well I stuck to Postum, and that was easy, because it tasted so good. Now after a year's using I can truly say I never felt better in my life, have no trouble whatever with my stomach, sleep well, eat well, and weigh 127½ pounds. My nervous headaches have all disappeared. I feel like telling everybody that is ill to try leaving off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee, for it will surely work a cure." Mrs. Ella Kitching, Salinas, Calif.

China Letter.

There is no improvement in the situation here. Edicts and counter edicts are wild, contradictory and confusing. The native Christians are being counted as sheep for the slaughter. Details are just reaching us of the martyrdom of our brave and devoted fellow-laborers in the north.

Most pathetic letters are coming in. The two following were written by Mrs. E. R. Atwater shortly before her head and that of her husband and baby fell beneath the headsman's ax, and was given into the care of the gatekeeper, who appears to have faithfully fulfilled the trust and forwarded them here by his son a few days ago. These letters will be treasured by the bereaved relatives, and tell us all the little that we shall probably ever know of a personal nature of the last hours of the victims of Yu Hsien's fiendish cruelty. This is the only word that has reached the coast of the fifty-nine persons done to death in Shansi.

A VOICE FROM THE GRAVE OF MARTYRS.

DEAR ONES AT TAIKU:—MRS. CLAPP, ROWENA, LOUISE.

FENCHOWFU, July 30.—The gentlemen's letters will tell you what our next step is, so I won't speak of it. This last news from you confirming our fears concerning the dear ones at Taiyuan was hard, God knows how hard, for us to bear, but I cannot write of it yet. We passed a terrible night and in the morning there was the very Li-hai proclamation ordering us out almost at once. I could do nothing but cry to God; it seemed as if I could bear no more in my present condition. No one talked at meals. We seemed to be waiting for the end, and I for my part longed that it might come speedily. He Kou went like a brave fellow to the Yamen to ask if we could not have an escort to the river. We could hire nothing unless the Kuan helped us. He stayed so long we feared he had been beaten, but our fears for once were groundless. And yet, although an escort has been promised, I feel very uneasy. The new Kuan has come, but the old one will not give up his authority and there is considerable friction in consequence. How it may affect our going I do not know. We are in the Lord's hands. What will you plan to do? We wish we could know. I do pray you may be led every step. I wish I could think it safe to go toward Hankow. It seems such a risk, but there seems nothing else for it now. May God keep each one of you. He is our only help. With much love to each of you, and kindest regards to Mr. Davis, Mr. Clapp and Mr. Williams, ever lovingly, LIZZIE ATWATER.

LATER.

August 2.—Our plans are upset; we do not think we can escape from the city. Several of the church members are planning to conceal us if we divide up. It is hard to do that. Mr. Lei wishes to conceal me in his home right here in the city, but I want to stay with my dear husband while life is given to us. Heaven seems very near, these last hours, and I feel quite calm

There will be a joyful welcome for us all above. I am fixing my thoughts more and more on the glorious hereafter, and it gives me wonderful peace. God bless you all. Yours in blessed hope, L. A.

Note on the envelope: The foreigners at Taiku, six in number, were beheaded yesterday, August 1st.

FENCHOWFU, August 3.— My dear, dear ones:—I have tried to gather courage to write to you once more How am I to write all the horrible details of these days? I would rather spare you. The dear ones at Shou Yang, seven in all, including our lovely girls, were taken prisoners and brought to Taiyuan in irons and there by the governor's orders beheaded, together with the Taiyuan friends, thirty-three souls. The following day the Roman Catholic priests and nuns, Taiyuan, were also beheaded, ten souls yesterday. Three weeks after these had perished our mission at Taiku was attacked, and our six friends there and several brave Christians who stood by them were beheaded. We are now waiting our call home. We have tried to get away to the hills, but the plans do not work. Our things are being stolen right and left, for the people know that we are condemned. Why our lives have been spared we cannot tell. The proclamation says that whoever kills us will be doing the governor a great service. Our magistrate has kept peace so far, but if these men come from Taiku there is not much hope, and there seems none any way we turn. The foreign soldiers are in Paotingfu and it is said that peace is made. This would save us in any civilized land, no matter what people may say. The governor seems to be in haste to finish his bloody work, for which there is little doubt he was sent to Shansi. Dear ones, I long for a sight of your dear faces, but I fear we shall not meet on earth. I have loved you all so much, and know you will not forget the one who lies in China. There never were sisters and brothers like mine. I am preparing for the end very quietly and calmly. The Lord is wonderfully near and he will not fail me. I was very restless and excited while there seemed a chance of life, but God has taken away that feeling, and now I just pray for grace to meet the terrible end bravely. The pain will soon be over and, oh, the sweetness of the welcome above.

My little baby will go with me. I think God will give it to me in heaven, and my dear mother will be so glad to see us. I can not imagine the Savior's welcome. Oh, that will compensate for all these days of suspense. Dear ones, live near to God and cling less closely to earth. There is no other way by which we can receive that peace from God which passeth understanding. I would like to send a special message to each one of you, but it tries me too much. I must keep calm and still these hours. I do not regret coming to China, but I am sorry I have done so little. My married life, two precious years, has been so very full of happiness. We will die together, my dear husband and I.

I used to dread separation. If we escape now it will be a miracle. I send my love to you all, and the dear friends who remember me. Your loving sister— LIZZIE.

Some of the bravest and best have been taken. Who will fill their places? While our hearts are sad and our lives made gloomy, yet we have hope that the day of China's redemption must be near.

May God guide the responsible governments in the securing of a real and permanent peace. This is the burden of our prayers just now.

Yours in hope,
WM. REMFRY HUNT.

Every live and enterprising business institution seeks by all legitimate means to increase its business. In this respect the publishers of newspapers don't differ essentially from other men. It transpires therefore that we are on the alert for new business and always diligently seeking new advertising patrons. While this is true it however affords us an infinitely greater amount of pleasure to realize that we merit the continued patronage of an old customer. We are led to refer to this matter by the re-appearance in our columns of the Elkhart Carriage & Harness Mfg. Co., of Elkhart, Ind., whose advertisement will be found on another page of this issue. These people have long been in our paper and are well known to our readers as the manufacturers of good and reliable goods and for their honest and upright business methods. We take pleasure in again recommending them to our people.

The Lord's Supper.*

The discourse of Jesus which he delivered his disciples while seated on the western ope of Olivet, which included the parables our last two lessons, ended with the graphic ortrayal of the judgment scene, when the on of man should come in his glory to sepate between those who have wrought good the name of Jesus and those who have lived erely for self. Eternal life and eternal pun-hment are the two contrasted ends of human robation.

Rising up with his disciples, the Master ok his way over the spur of the mountain wards Bethany, saying as they went, "Ye ow that after two days the Passover com-h, and the Son of man is delivered up to be ucified." The shadow of a great grief fell every heart; He whom they loved and in om they had hoped to find the long-desired essiah, was to be put to death. They had ught against this conviction as long as pos-ble. They could doubt no longer. What of e kingdom which he was to establish, the liverance he was to effect for Israel? How uld one so faithful and pure show his more an human wisdom, power and love, only to appoint those who believed in him? They re bewildered, but, let it be said to their rnal glory, they still loved and trusted
n. Not all of them, alas! One "son of pertion" had arisen within the charmed circle.
das, whose sordid soul had resented the ste of the ointment poured by Mary upon e Master's feet, now saw all his hopes of thly profit and honor dashed to the ground d naught but ignominy and peril before se who followed longer the Nazarene. He le away into the city and bargained with e chief priests to betray Jesus, receiving for baseness the thirty pieces of silver which re the price of the poorest slave.

Jesus spent Wednesday of the Passover ek in retirement in Bethany. No record is en of how he passed its quiet hours; but may assume that he communed much with heavenly Father, and gathered strength the mighty trial which he was to undergo delivering the world from sin. On Thurs-y morning, the 14th of Nisan, the day on ich the Passover lamb was to be slain, the ciples inquired of him where they should ke ready for the feast, which was to be en after nightfall, which would be the bening of the 15th of Nisan, the Jewish day mmencing at the setting of the sun. Ac-ding to the accounts of Mark and Luke, o of the disciples, Peter and John, were t into the city, and told to follow to his ne a man whom they would meet, bearing itcher of water. They were to say to the ner of the house that the Master wished to the Passover with his disciples there, and would show them an upper room, furnished the meal. They did as he had said and pared all things for the supper.

When the evening was come and the setting had ushered in the day of the feast, Jesus hered the twelve around the table for the al which, to the pious Jew, was the most red of all the year. It brought to his re-nbrance the deliverance wrought in Israel's alf when the yoke of Egypt was forever ken from their necks, and they were called into the fuller and freer life of the prom-l land. Above all other Passovers this uld be memorable, as the occasion of the itution of a new feast, whose spiritual nificance should overshadow all the hal-red observances of Judaism and which uld become a part of the religious symbol-of a regenerated world. But even amid h holy associations earthly ambition ust itself, and the disciples again disputed as to who should be the greatest. Not with words alone did the Master rebuke them. Rising from the table, ere the meal was well begun, he girded himself with a towel, and taking a basin of water, he washed the feet of all the company, an office that belonged to the humblest servant of the household. The lesson was effective. Never again did they dispute, except for the honor of being first in sacrifice or service. Pride had been crucified in their hearts, upon the altar of Christ's humility.

And now the heart of Jesus was wrung with agony, as he thought of the one guest at his table whose soul was full of treason. One whom he had chosen to be a herald of grace to the world, one who had been with him during all these years of busy teaching and unselfish working, had already bargained with his enemies to betray him. The presence of Judas seemed to stifle the Master. He could not utter the sacred truths which he had reserved for this hallowed hour while the traitor was by him. He suddenly exclaimed, "Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me." They were filled with consternation. What! could it be possible that such a viper had been cherished in the bosom of this little company, whose hearts had been drawn unto the Master with resistless power? Could it be that one who had felt the blessed hands of Jesus upon his dusty feet, and who was now sharing with him the hallowed feast, would basely hand him over into the hands of his enemies? Yes, "the hands of the Lord of life had just washed the traitor's feet. Oh, strange, unfathomable depth of human infatuation and ingratitude; that traitor, with all the black and accursed treachery in his false heart, had seen, had known, had suffered it; had felt the touch of those kind and gentle hands, had been refreshed by the cleansing water, had seen that sacred head bent over his feet, stained as they yet were with the hurried, secret walk which had taken him into the throng of sanctimonious murderers over the shoulder of Olivet. But for him there had been no purification in that lustral water; neither was the devil within him exorcised by that gentle voice, nor the leprosy of his heart healed by that miracle-producing touch."

A strange self-distrust entered every heart in the little circle. Suddenly each one seemed to look down into an awful gulf of possible sin. Awestruck they ask, one after another, "Lord, is it I?" Judas, afraid to be silent, yet choking with the words, whispered to Jesus, "Rabbi, is it I?" Jesus answered him, "Thou hast said." The others seem not to have heard this part of the conversation, and John tells us how Peter signaled to him as he reclined upon Jesus' bosom, to ask which one the traitor was, and that the Master answered him by giving to Judas a morsel which he had dipped in the dish. Longer dissembling was useless. Now that the Master knew his evil purpose, even Judas could not longer play the hypocrite. He rose up as if to depart, and Jesus said to him, "That thou doest, do quickly." The other apostles thought that he was going to procure additional provisions for the seven days during which the feast lasted. But he was going forth to that deed which should render his name forever infamous among the sons of men. Satan had entered into him, his soul was surrendered unto evil and the short way that yet lay before him was lighted only by the flames of lurid passion, and ended in a vast gulf of utter and irretrievable ruin.

In sweet discourse, after the departure of Judas, the feast progressed, until near its close Jesus instituted one of the two ordinances by which the great facts of his gospel should be perpetuated in the world, the Lord's Supper. Using the simple loaf and cup of wine that lay before him, which formed a part of the Passover meal, he gave them a new and high significance which made them forever holy. "This is my body, which is given for you, take, eat. This is my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. Drink ye all of it." These are the simple words with which he commends to us that blessed feast of faith and love. It is a sweet memorial of him who gave his life for us. "Do this in memory of me." How can we be indifferent to its regular observance? It is an act of loving obedience. "Take, eat. Drink ye all of it." Is this not as binding upon us as the command to be baptized, or to confess his name before men? It is a sign of our fellowship in him. Paul declares that it is "the communion of the body and blood of Christ." It is a memorial of our pardon through his blood. "Shed for many for the remission of sins" is the blessed fact which the purple juice of the grape brings anew to our minds. It is a trumpet note of final victory through him. "As often as ye eat this bread and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come."

Wonderful feast of sorrow and suffering, of love and life, of memory and hope. The disciples saw in it the bitterness of death, the ignominy of the cross. What did Jesus see in it? The rough wood of the cross, the piercing nails, the thrusting spear and the flowing blood? Yes, but what more did he see? "Far down the years quiet groups in holy houses, sitting with bowed heads. The dull white of broken bread, the gleam of red wine. . . . Prayer and sacred song are softly audible. . . . With wet eyes, with hushed hearts, those who celebrate this solemnity do think of him; they murmur a name, —it is his; they melt with tenderness for suffering—it is his."

TOPIC FOR FEBRUARY 17.

Confessing Christ.

(Matt. 10:32-39.)

It is not always—not often—an easy thing to confess Christ. That is why a reward is offered for doing it. I have known of men who had walked up to the cannon's mouth, or to a row of levelled muskets in our civil war, who have begged the preacher to come halfway down the aisle to meet them, as they walked up to confess Christ.

And yet more, in the face of loss and disaster, financially, socially, politically and even in religious circles, it is not always an easy thing to confess the Truth, or in other words, confess Christ.

For example, the railroad you work for, or the coal company, or the oil company, demands of you to bear witness to a perversion of facts in order to sell goods, or demands of you that you do what outrages conscience and denies truth and right, or Christ (which is the same). What do you do? Your occupation depends upon obedience. If you confess the Truth and are loyal to Christ, your position goes, your wife must work harder, your children must be hungry.

Or, you see a great evil going on in the country; you see a heartless, godless bleeding of the people going forward; you see, for example, that great oil trust which has its fingers in the heartstrings of the poorest family in this country and wrings and wrings, and all the while you raise no protest. You continue to buy their oil, to sell it in your grocery store, to keep your tongue tied, and not to confess to the Truth by denouncing the devil. It is not an easy thing to confess Christ.

Or, again, you are pastor of a church; you have read or learned in some wise truths that your congregation needs. You feel there are wrongs to be righted. (I'm not talking about the petty question of how people amuse themselves, but great, fierce wrongs about competition in business, nefarious business, heartless money dealings, debaucheries of the young by old distillers of evil for gain.) You undertake to preach against them and your leading officer quietly buttonholes you and thumb-screws you and you immediately announce that you have changed your subject and will speak on the Beauties of Nature. It is hard to confess the Truth.

Or, to take other ground, you are a Sunday-school teacher and you have learned certain ways of thinking that will liberate the minds of many of your scholars from hard knots, and yet these views are discountenanced by the officers or the pastor or somebody or other. What do you do? Bear witness to the Truth, or do you deny Christ? Ah, the world is full of Peters. We all have our Cæsarea Philippis, where we confess with joy; and we all have our courtyards of this world's potentates, where we deny with cursings.

Do you dare to-morrow, fellow-Endeavorer, to go into your office or your store, or your pulpit, or your class, or your home, or your employer's sanctum, and confess the Truth?

COLGAN.

n Monday, Jan. 14, at 1:45 P. M., after a gering illness of several years' duration, ss Martha Colgan, daughter of the late W. Colgan, passed from a land where sorrow l suffering are a common experience, to e where such things are unknown. She s born near Hickman Mills, Mo., but while e was yet a young child her parents removed Kansas City, Mo., where the remainder of life was spent. She received her educa- n in the public schools of that city, gradu- ng from the High School in the class of 0. A dutiful daughter, quiet, kind and ughtful, her daily walk was consistent th her Christian profession. During the t four months she endured the most in- se suffering with patience and even cheer- ness. Her faith never faltered and death ought to her no terrors. Peacefully she parted to join her father on the other shore, ving to her mother and sister, Mrs. M. ay, the sweet memory of a fragrant life.

DOOLITTLE.

David, the six-year-old son of Bro. and ster Doolittle, was killed Jan. 22 by a reet car. The little fellow had gotten home om school and was talking with some of his aymates and started to cross the street me, stepping on the track just in front of e car, and through fright stopped. The car as so close and going at such speed that it uld not be stopped. It struck him in the ght temple, crushing his skull and killing n instantly. The car passed over the body angling it very badly. It was a horrible ght to greet the eyes of the mother and ther. And while it was a hard blow to em, I believe the greatest sufferer is the otorman who was running the car. He was antic with grief. He would wring his hands d cry like a child. He cannot be reconciled r comforted. The funeral was conducted the church, which was crowded to its ut- ost. Dave was one of the faithful members our Junior Endeavor and will be greatly issed. The family have the sympathy of the tire church. R. B. Givens, minister.

JACKSON.

Mrs. Julia Waters Jackson, wife and con- ant companion for 52 years of Elder Cortes ckson, of Denver, Colo., died at her home heart failure without a moment's warning nuary 3d. Sister Julia was born and mar- ed near New London, Mo. Her father, G. . Waters, was a man of strong individuality d a pioneer minister in that part of the ate away back in the forties. Her only other living is Col. Waters, of Canton, who well known over the state. For a number years she and her husband lived in Louisi- a, Mo., and Fayetteville, Ark. While re- ling at the latter place they were close ends of Robt. Graham, just deceased. Sis- Julia was a favorite with us all, in her rlier days she was considered very hand- me, though apparently never aware of it rself. It was her long sacrifice for an in- lid family, her intelligent mind, sweet ristian character and devotion to the minor ties of life that made of her a model wife d mother and church member. H. C. KELLOGG.

Rosetta Caroline Hollingsworth was born in Indiana, Nov. 21, 1870. Went with her father to Elsie, Neb., in 1886. Was married to Orison Alonzo Kellogg in February, 1888. She united with the Christian Church in 1890; 1894 she, with her husband, went to Colorado where they remained till 1896, when they moved to Benton Co., Iowa. Mrs. Kellogg was a patient sufferer for many weeks but her faith in her Savior never wavered. She was an earnest worker in the church and Endeavor Society. She died Sunday eve, Sept. 23, at 5 P. M. She left a kind husband and three children to mourn their loss. Funeral services on Tuesday conducted by Jas. G. Nichols, of Vinton.

MATTHEWS.

Alonzo A. Matthews died Dec. 21, 1900, at the age of 88 years, 8 months and 5 days. The subject of our sketch was born in Massachusetts, March 26, 1812. His father with his family moved to Mentor, O., in 1813, settling on a farm. Alonzo married Charlotte Williams in Lenox, O., Feb. 29, 1836. They lived in Michigan and Indiana where he practiced medicine and a few years later returning to Ohio and settling in Bissell, Geauga county. In early life he united with the Disciples and was an ardent supporter of Alex. Campbell, Isaac Errett and the other pioneers of that faith. Moved to Illinois in the spring of 1856, settling at Erie. Through his influence the church of Disciples was organized there with a comfortable house of worship. There were born to them nine children, four of whom preceded him in death, those remaining are L. E., of Morrison, Ill.; Mrs. Julia Herriman, Morrisville, Mo.; G. G., of Chicago; Mrs. Carrie B. Gridley, of Savannah, Ill., and Anso A., of Erie, Ill., and his loving wife. He selected the passage of scripture for the text to be used at his funeral, "Master, where dwellest thou? He sayest unto them, come and see" John 1:38,39. Elder Salmon officiated at the funeral. The church has lost its senior elder, the community a faithful citizen, the family a kind father and husband. He retained his consciousness to the last moment and said, "How many of you will meet me?"

NORRIS.

Perry B. Norris was born in Washington county, Ky., Jan. 19, 1825, and died at his home in Hannibal, Mo., Jan. 14, 1901. He was a faithful member of the church having begun to serve his Master at the age of 18 years. He was confined to his room for over three years and yet never complained; he was always patient in health and in sickness. His religious experience was steady and cumulative. The more he suffered the more obedient and patient he became. His was an everyday religion. He was an honored member of the Hannibal church for 45 years and for some time was a deacon. He has made a lasting contribution to the religious life of the community. He leaves wife, four children and a step-son, J. O. Farmer, who was as dear to him as his own. Sister Norris goes to reside with her daughter, Mrs. Charles J. Lewis, of Minneapolis. He leaves to his children, who left nothing undone for his comfort, the example of a life of unfaltering trust in the goodness of God. At his own request the funeral was held at the church where he loved so much to be. A beautiful floral offering was a clock designating the hour of departure from earthly scenes.

Levi Marshall.

RANK.

Miss Josie Rank died Jan. 22, 1901. She took the spinal meningitis when sixteen years old, and for three years and eight months she has been a sufferer, the larger part of the time confined to her bed. She was exceedingly patient, never complained. And when she realized that she could not get well, then her desire was to depart, and she longed for the hour. The funeral was conducted at the home at her request, by the writer.

THOMAS.

Josiah Thomas died at Hannibal, Mo., Jan. 19, 1901, aged 69 years. He was a true man of God and loved the church and all who tried to set forth the truth in their lives. As he was passing over he told me he was ready to go. His plain, earnest life and kind heart made him very companionable. Several children remain who will miss his cheerful presence. His wife passed to her reward years ago. The funeral service was conducted at New London, Mo. Levi Marshall.

Book Notes.

We know from past experience that there are a great many Sunday-school workers who will order the Christian Lesson Commentary some time during 1901. From a business standpoint, it makes no difference to us whether you order the Commentary now or next August. The price will be just the same. But for the sake of the purchasers, we urge all teachers to secure this book immediately. It contains the S. S. lessons for the year 1901, and if you delay ordering it until some time in May, you have lost one-third of its benefit. In other words, the sooner you order the book, the more you get in exchange for the dollar you invest.

W. J. Russell's new book, What is Your Life? which is just out, is a thing of beauty, inside and out. Mechanically, the book compares favorably with anything that we have issued. It is printed on good paper, in good type, and is well bound. The contents of the book are valuable. Its 316 pages are divided into seventeen chapters, the titles of which we here give:

I. What is your Life?
II. The Value of Time.
III. The Body and Good Health.
IV. Intellectual and Moral Culture.
V. Character Building.
VI. The Value and Power of Enthusiasm.
VII. The Business Life.
VIII. Christian Citizenship.
IX. Influence, or Casting Shadows in Life.
X. Pure Speech, or Words that are Golden.
XI. Good Books and Good Reading.

Parents can find no better book than this to put in the hands of their children. Mr. Russell has the happy faculty of writing in an entertaining, interesting manner. Young people will read this book when they would decline to read some more didactic treatise. The price of this book is $1.00.

That all our patrons have not yet secured our new catalogue is proven by the fact that we are daily in receipt of orders for books accompanied by too much money! In our new General Catalogue, prices were very generally reduced, and if you order from any previous edition, you are likely to send us double the present price of the book you wish. We do not like to have this occur, as it necessitates, for us, the harrowing process of sending part of the money back. Our new catalogue of 100 pages, profusely illustrated, will be sent free, for the asking.

The Tract Library of twenty-seven pamphlets and tracts, offered for One Dollar, is another offer that has been well received by the readers of this paper. We do not know of any way in which a person can get so much first-class literature bearing upon the plea of the Disciples of Christ for so little money as he can by sending us a dollar for this Tract Library. Many of the pamphlets in the set sell, singly, for ten or fifteen cents each. All of them are the work of able men.

Good words concerning The Lesson Commentary continue to come from all quarters. The following is a specimen of the latest:

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARK., Jan. 31, 1901.

Again the veteran editor of the Christian Lesson Commentary comes to the front with his splendid book for 1901, designed to aid Sunday-school teachers and advanced scholars. Wilbur F. Storey, the great editor and founder of the old Chicago Times, once said to the writer that "he never kept an editorial writer on his paper for more than six months at a time, for the reason that he could get out all there was in him within that time." But that rule does not seem to apply to the editor of the Christian Lesson Commentary, for notwithstanding the many years he has brought out that book, each succeeding year seems to excels the preceding one.

I have carefully examined the book for 1901 and cannot see how it could be improved within the limits of its scope and purpose. A distinguished educator, superintendent of schools in our city, not of our Church, often borrows these books for study and says that they are the best he has seen anywhere. I am delighted with the size, workmanship, style, method and contents of the present volume and cannot say too much in its praise. Hope the editor's life will be spared for many more such publications as he is the right man in the right place. GEO. C. CHRISTIAN.

Our Fire Insurance.

In 1896 the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church met in Cleveland, and appointed a Board of Insurance to organize a mutual Church Insurance Company for the benefit of their churches in the United States. This board had a meeting and organized with headquarters in Chicago. It has now been in operation two years and is successful. For the first nine months their average loss ratio was less than 10 per cent. of the average losses realized by stock companies doing a miscellaneous business, and their expense ratio was less than one-half. They have in these two years paid all expenses and have money left which is divided among the policyholders. I wish to ask, Can we follow their example? Instead of paying our money to other stock companies have it in our own hands. Could it not be in connection with the Church Extension Board? It will be a great saving to the churches and half the money now paid for fire insurance could be spent on mission work.

Vol. xxxviii. St. Louis, Mo., Thursday, February 14, 1901. No. 7.

Current Events.

Primaries in St. Louis. The Democratic primaries held in St. Louis on Monday of this week resulted in the choice of a large majority of delegates in favor of Rolla Wells. Mr. Wells will therefore doubtless be the Democratic nominee for World's Fair mayor of this city. His personal record is clean and his candidacy will have a wide support among those who hold the opinion that the mayor of a great city should at least have the virtue of common honesty. The fact that Mr. Wells is enthusiastically supported by the notorious Butler and Swift and an extraordinarily corrupt machine as well as by that element of the party which is most anxious for reform, is a somewhat curious circumstance which may easily give offense to some of the latter. Mr. Wells is a gold Democrat and opposed Mr. Bryan's election both in 1896 and 1900. His nomination, and still more his election, would appear to be the herald of Democratic reorganization so far as the St. Louis democracy is concerned—and perhaps farther.

Sermons on Municipal Purity. On last Sunday the pulpits of St. Louis blew a simultaneous blast of indignation and warning against the corruption of our city government. In view of the approach of a municipal election, which is especially important because of the corruptness of our present administration and because we are about to elect a World's Fair mayor, the Evangelical Alliance requested all the preachers of the city to make this the subject of their discourse on that day. Most of them complied, and this fact itself is evidence of a striking change in the attitude of the St. Louis ministry toward city affairs. The texts of these sermons on civic righteousness are themselves interesting: "A citizen of no mean city" (Acts 21:39). "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" (Mark 12:17). "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is emboldened to do evil" (Eccl. 8:11). "When there is no vision the people perish" (Prov. 19:18). "And the city was pure gold like unto pure glass. And there shall in no wise enter into it anything unclean or he that maketh an abomination and a lie" (Rev. 21:18,27). The following points were emphasized in some of the strongest sermons: A righteous public opinion is the strongest force in municipal government. Church and state are separate in this country, but religious and patriotic sentiment must unite to produce righteous city government. Contempt of law is the root of civic corruption; let the emphasis be laid on the enforcement of existing laws rather than on the enactment of new ones. The blame for the present evil conditions rests with the so-called respectable people: as directors of great corporations they spend money dishonestly and corrupt the officials; as citizens they are not willing to take time and pains to oppose the dishonest schemes of those who are in politics for revenue only. A base minority makes an unclean city because the decent majority is inert and divided. The most fundamental need of all is for a separation between party politics and city government. These are all wholesome truths and in the proclamation of them the pulpit is fulfilling its legitimate function.

A New Steel Combine. It is reported unofficially, but with every appearance of truth, that Mr. Carnegie has sold out his entire steel interests to J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., and that the outcome of the transaction is to be a combination of several of the largest steel companies in the country into one gigantic corporation. Those in a position to make official statements have maintained a discreet silence, broken only by the declaration of E. H. Gary, President of the Federal Steel Company, that such a transaction is contemplated, but that there will be no monopoly or trust formed. In spite of conflicting rumors, it is reasonably certain that Mr. Carnegie has actually sold his enormous interests, which included everything connected with the steel industry—ore beds, coal lands, coke furnaces, steel foundries, a railroad and a line of steamers. It is equally certain that the new corporation will include at least the Carnegie Steel Co., the Federal Steel Co., the National Steel Co., and the American Steel and Wire Co., with a combined capital of not much less than a billion dollars. It is reported that Mr. Carnegie will retire and spend the remainder of his days in administering his charities and endowing libraries, for which purpose he will have a surplus income of about a million a month.

Progress on Cuba's Constitution. The constitution-makers in Cuba are virtually at the end of their task. The paragraph declaring the new government not responsible for debts contracted before the promulgation of the constitution, except the legitimate expenses of the revolution after Feb. 24, 1895, has been approved. By this decision Cuba repudiates a debt of about $600,000,000 which Spain contracted by mortgaging the Cuban customs to meet the expense of putting down the rebellion. Naturally enough Cuba does not care to be burdened with the cost of both sides of her recent war, and we cannot blame her for that. The danger into which the new government is likely to fall is seen in the disposition to expend large sums—larger than the treasury can stand—in paying those who took part in the revolution. Officers and men were paid in vouchers instead of cash, and as vouchers had but little immediate value, they were scattered thick. The strength of the Cuban army was at all times much overrated. When the United States soldiers entered Cuba to fight Spain, the reputed Cuban army of 40,000 dwindled to a miserable fraction of that. When it comes to paying for services rendered in the army, the new government will probably find itself confronted by an opportunity for fraud scarcely second to that presented by our own pension methods. The Cubans have not yet said anything about compensating the United States for her assistance in driving the Spaniards out of Cuba. The paragraph defining the qualifications for the presidency has been drawn up and approved in such form that Gen. Gomez, though not a native of the island, is eligible to that office. Senator Platt has drawn up a plan to govern the future relations between the United States and Cuba, by which we retain naval stations on the island and the right to oversee Cuba's foreign affairs. This will be opposed by many as savoring too much of annexation. Some are bold enough to say that the Teller rider on the declaration of war, in which Congress promised freedom to Cuba, was a mistake, but no one suggests that there is any possible course now but to live up to that promise.

The Work of Congress. Night sessions were held by the Senate last week for the discussion of the ship subsidy bill, but no appreciable progress was made and there was so much opposition to the night sessions that they have been abandoned for the present. As usual near the end of a session of Congress, the calendar is crowded with many appropriation bills which must be passed with comparatively little discussion. In the Senate the naval appropriation bill is now to the front and at intervals between speeches on this subject the discussion of the ship subsidy continues. The latter will be kept in the first place, yielding only to the necessary appropriation bills. The sundry civil appropriation bill, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill and the army appropriation bill have yet to be considered. To the latter, which the House is now considering, may be attached a rider providing legislation on some points in regard to our relations to Cuba and the Philippines. Mr. Spooner has already introduced an amendment authorizing the President to appoint persons to establish civil government in the Philippines with power to grant franchises. The latter feature is much needed for the development of the islands.

The Marriage of Wilhelmina. On Thursday of last week Wilhelmina, Queen of Holland, was married to Henry, Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, amid much pomp and rejoicing. According to Dutch law there was a civil ceremony and a religious ceremony, the former taking place in the royal palace at the Hague and the latter at the church. The marriage contract presented some curious features, not the least striking of which was the fact that the bride, although a queen in her own right, promised to obey her husband. Dutch views in regard to this feature of the marriage ceremony are very conservative and old fashioned. It was provided, however, that this promise of obedience should not extend to her official acts as queen. The Duke surrendered the Dutch husband's usual prerogative of administering his wife's property and the bride made over to him as a perpetual income the interest on $20,000,000 to meet his necessary expenses. Parliament had declined to grant him an annuity, but this sum from his wife's private purse ought to meet his requirements, especially since he will not have to pay the household expenses out of it. The celebration attending the marriage is said to have been very Dutch. It continued for several days and involved much out-of-door merry-making on the part of the common people, whose affection for their young queen is deep and sincere. The popular attitude toward the new Prince of the Netherlands is more problematical. He is German, and in general they do not like Germans. But the fact that their loved queen has seen fit to marry him is a strong word in his favor and they are prepared to learn to like him if he will give them half a chance.

Re-enforcements for South Africa. The statement that the British war office has at last acquired a sense of the seriousness of the situation in South Africa, sounds like a piece of belated news which should have arrived fifteen months ago. Lord Kitchener has been calling for heavy re-enforcements and the failure of the British troops to accomplish anything of consequence against their mobile enemy during the recent months, has won over the war office to his view. Gen. Roberts, who left South Africa with the declaration that the war was over, has frankly owned that he was mistaken and has recommended re-enforcements. They have been granted to the number of 30,000. The latest report from the field mentions an attack on a British position at Bothwell by Gen. Louis Botha with 2,000 men, which resulted in considerable casualties on both sides, the British loss being 24 killed and twice as many wounded. The Boers were repulsed. It is notable that the burghers have changed their tactics and, having no longer anything to defend, have taken to making attacks. The British army can go where it pleases, but it never finds at the end of its journey anything worth going for. It is not fast enough to be everywhere at once, so it must be re-enforced until its size shall make it practically ubiquitous. Even Gen. Kitchener cannot locate De Wet within a hundred miles for two days at a time, so it is clearly a hopeless task for the press to attempt to do so with accuracy. It is reported that an Anglo-Portuguese alliance is either in process of formation or actually complete. Portugal has already violated, or come very near to violating, the laws of neutrality by allowing British troops to land in Portuguese East Africa.

An Edict for Reform. The Chinese Emperor has issued a reforming edict which, on the surface, appears almost as radical as that which alarmed the conservatives and precipitated the recent anti-foreign crusade. The edict orders a consultation of the members of the privy council, the six boards, the nine offices, the Chinese ministers at foreign courts and all the viceroys and governors, to recommend specific reforms to be inaugurated in the seven branches of government, which are: The central government, ceremonies, taxes, schools, civil service examinations, military affairs and public economics. A report from this conference within two months is called for. High authorities express the opinion that this edict is an event of epoch-making importance. Later there comes a report that the Dowager Empress, who is said to be on the best of terms with the Emperor now, is also about to issue a liberal edict suggesting several reforms. If this is true, there may be several explanations for it, any one of which is more probable than that the Empress has undergone a change of heart toward the foreigners.

Punishment in China. The ministers of the Powers and the Chinese envoys are busily discussing the proposed punishment of those who were responsible for the work of the Boxers. The ministers agree in saying that, while the twelve princes and leaders already indicted deserve death, they will exercise a degree of clemency. They must all be condemned, but for three of the number, whose royal blood or military command makes it impossible to execute the death penalty upon them, the sentence may be commuted to banishment. Tung Fu Hsian and Princes Chwang and Tuan are among the twelve, and two of them will probably be among the fortunate three. Three others of the number are already dead, but the ministers insist that sentence must be pronounced against them anyway for the sake of its moral effect on the Chinese people. Whatever may be the effect on the Chinese of condemning a dead man to death, its effect upon Occidentals will be to suggest the celebrated case in which Thomas a Becket was dragged from his tomb in Canterbury Cathedral, nearly three centuries after his death, and tried for treason by order of Henry VIII, as an excuse for appropriating the treasures with which his shrine had been enriched. It is said that the Emperor protests against the capital punishment of the parties named, and the peace envoys, though they have plenipotentiary power, dare not accept such proposals without referring to headquarters. The French troops in the vicinity of Pao Ting Fu, under Gen. Bailloud, are giving trouble to the commander-in-chief by refusing to submit to his authority and threatening to conduct an expedition in the province of Shan Si to put down an "incipient rebellion." Count von Waldersee is doubtless quite right in opposing any further military expeditions while negotiations are in progress. The only pity is that he did not discover sooner that there was no need for military expeditions where there was no armed enemy. The original expedition to Pao Ting Fu, which was delayed to give the Germans a chance to participate until every rational excuse for it had ceased to exist, was no less unnecessary than the proposed French expedition into the province of Shan Si.

Brevities. Christian Scientists have representatives at Jefferson City opposing a bill which requires all persons practicing medicine to pass an examination in anatomy, chemistry, therapeutics and general surgery. Osteopaths also object to a part of the bill.

Henry E. Youtsey has been convicted of complicity in the murder of Goebel and sentenced to imprisonment for life. His attorneys assert that the jury which convicted him was composed of twelve Goebel Democrats and that 124 out of the 125 witnesses were of the same faith.

Governor Nash of Ohio is making a good fight against prize-fighting. The State Emergency Board has authorized an expenditure of $50,000 if necessary to prevent the Jeffries-Ruhlin fight in Cincinnati.

The legislatures in Nebraska, Oregon and Delaware are deadlocked in their efforts to elect United States Senators.

General Miles has been promoted under the new army reorganization law to the rank of Lieutenant-General. The plain civilian cannot remember off-hand anything very great that General Miles ever did to merit so high a position.

The British death list from wounds and disease in the South African war now amounts to 12,989. There were 830 deaths in January.

A terrible fire in the Russian oil region near the Ural Mountains, beginning with the burning of an immense naphtha reservoir, destroyed about two hundred lives.

A difficult situation is presented to King Victor Emmanuel by the resignation of the members of the Italian Cabinet. The resignations have been accepted.

The people of St. Louis have an eye on Seibert, the new Excise Commissioner. They are looking for signs of the closing of the wine-rooms.

The evidence of the contestant in the Horton-Butler case is all in and many election frauds have been proved. Forty days will now be allowed for the defendant to present evidence, and ten days for rebuttal by the contestant, after which the evidence will go to Washington to the Congressional Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The War Department has issued an anti-canteen order in agreement with the law recently passed. The order extends the prohibition of liquor-selling to the hotels and officers' club at Fort Monroe.

The famous "white elephant" of proverb and tradition was a trifling dilemma compared to the plight of the Springfield (Ill.) express company which is holding a corpse on which it has not been able to collect the C. O. D.

Gen. Benjamin M. Prentiss, a veteran of the Mexican and Civil wars, died at his home in Bethany, Mo., Feb. 8.

Minister Wu declined to attend a dinner given in honor of General Otis, because the latter, while in the Philippines, stopped Chinese immigration to the islands.

The Louisiana Purchase World's Fair bill has been favorably reported in the House. The Senate committee has expressed itself favorably, but without formal action.

At a mass meeting in Topeka a thousand men pledged themselves to a crusade against the saloons. A resolution was passed giving the saloons until Friday noon to get their fixtures out of the city.

What is a Sect?

In "Christianity in the Nineteenth Century," by Dr. George C. Lorimer, there is a reference to the religious movement inaugurated by the Campbells, father and son, in the first decade, to which at the time we reviewed the book we promised to give further attention at some time in the future. It is our purpose now to fulfill that promise.

In discussing the general topic of the Disruption and Reunion, Dr. Lorimer, referring to the Disciples of Christ as a movement "inspired by the genius of Alexander Campbell, one of the most remarkable religious leaders of the nineteenth century," says:

"They were an earnest and aggressive people, and probably are so still, and multiplied rapidly in the south and southwestern portions of the country. Their peculiar tenets gave rise to much controversy, and it is doubtful whether any summary could be given that would prove satisfactory to their advocates. But there was one teaching for which they were distinguished that concerns us here. They raised their voice against sectarianism and announced themselves as its destroyer. It seems that they imagined that they had abolished it as far as they themselves were concerned by taking to themselves the name of Disciples, by professing to derive all their sentiments from the New Testament, and by organizing themselves into another sect, yet further dividing the body of Christ. The word 'sect,' from the Latin secta, a path, a beaten way, hence to follow, is always applied to a portion of the Christian host, and never to it as a whole; and consequently, the Disciples have to assume that they are the totality of the redeemed on earth—which I am sure they would not assert—or in the true sense of the word they constitute a sect. In spirit they may be as catholic as the most catholic soul could wish, but that does not alter the fact that when they withdrew and set up for themselves they either became the whole of Christianity or a part, and if a part, then they became what they labor to convince others it is wrong to be. Nevertheless, the value of their testimony is not to be depreciated. It meant something to have this large number of intelligent people join together in a protest against the strife and discord of Christian churches. And the seeming impossibility of their escaping from the entanglement they condemned only added pathos and power to their plea. It indicated that even when there is no sectarianism in the heart, we are obliged to affiliate with a sect to gain a fulcrum for our spiritual leverage. Hardly anything more than this is needed to demonstrate that the Disciples are right in their contention, and that some measures looking toward unification should be adopted. They are entitled to commendation for their devotion to a vital principle, and one that is destined to exert an incalculable influence on the Christianity of the immediate future." (Pp. 420-21.)

Using the word "sect" in the sense in which Dr. Lorimer employs it in the above quotation, there is no discredit whatever attached to the word. Not only is every religious body or denomination a sect, but every local church is a sect, for each of these is a part and not the whole of the Christian Church. In this sense of the word, the Disciples are, of course, a sect; that is, they are a part of the Christian world and not the whole of it. They never claimed to be the whole, of course, because in that event their plea for Christian union would have been absurd on its face. Nor is it true that "they imagined they had abolished it [sectarianism] as far as they themselves were concerned by taking to themselves the name Disciples, by professing to derive all their sentiments from the New Testament, and by organizing themselves into another sect, yet further dividing the body of Christ." Their contention was and is that divisions among Christians had resulted from a departure from the simplicity and catholicity of the New Testament and that the only way to restore union is to return to the New Testament basis. They claimed and still claim that, in so far as they have returned in teaching and practice to the New Testament Church, they have freed themselves from any responsibility for the existence and perpetuation of our sectarian divisions. This claim, it seems to us, hardly admits of discussion. It is only a question as to how far they have succeeded in returning to that basis of unity which prevailed in the early Church and on which Christ prayed that His followers might be one.

Let us then analyze the general proposition stated above, that we may see what its content is, as interpreted by those who choose to be known as Disciples of Christ, or Christians. To return to the catholicity of New Testament teaching and to the original basis of unity, according to their understanding, involves the following negative and positive actions:

1. The repudiation of all human formulations of doctrine as authoritative or binding on the conscience and as bases of fellowship, and the acceptance instead thereof of the New Testament creed—the Messiahship and divinity of Jesus of Nazareth, faith in whom is the essential saving faith.

2. Obedience to Christ in all His appointments as the condition of discipleship and fellowship.

3. The giving up of party names, as the outward badge of division, and wearing those non-partisan names by which the followers of Christ were designated before the origin of denominational divisions and names.

4. The surrender of those human traditions which make void or obscure the word of God, and the steadfast adherence to the inspired teaching of the Holy Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice.

It is not for us to say how far we have been successful in carrying out this program for Christian unity. We are deeply conscious of the fact that we have not always been true in practice to this very high standard which we erected for ourselves. Nevertheless, we have never lowered the standard as the ideal toward which we are to struggle as the goal of Christian unity. We feel justified in saying, too, that we have honestly sought and are seeking to be true to this ideal.

That such a movement, so revolutionary in its influence on prevailing ideals at the time of its origin, should have given rise to much controversy and even to misrepresentation and to bitter persecution, is what might have been expected in view of the weaknesses of our poor human nature. Religious reforms have always been attended by such phenomena. It is gratifying, however, to know that we have virtually passed out of this era of controversy and strife, when our aims and principles are better understood and when the influence of the movement is recognized in the courteous and unprejudiced way illustrated by the statement we have given above from Dr. Lorimer. It is coming to be understood that the work of the Disciples of Christ is constructive rather than destructive, and that it has only been destructive in so far as this was essential to a permanent constructive work.

Whether this effort at Christian union has made us a sect or not, we shall not stop here to argue. We have been accustomed to think of a sect as a party occupying a noncatholic basis, a foundation other than that which has been laid by divine authority. The question we would ask our religious neighbors to consider is, Is the basis we have proposed in harmony with the New Testament? If not, we desire immediately to make it conform to such teaching. If it does so conform and if it should be practically accepted by the Christian world, we should have, neither a number of conflicting sects nor a vast ecclesiastical machine, but a brotherhood of free, autonomous, co-operating Christian churches, making up the one body of Christ—the realization of Christ's prayer for the unity of His disciples.

Is Christianity Responsible?

Mark Twain's satire on what is called Christian civilization, in the current number of the North American Review, is not wholly without justification. His humor is grim enough, when studied in the light of the real facts of the case. Nevertheless, it is not a difficult thing to follow the distinguished humorist to conclusions which are not in any legitimate premises. The extreme conduct of some of the missionaries in China more than justifies his biting irony, in so far as their cases are concerned. But Christianity itself must not be held responsible for misrepresentations of it in either theory or practice. We have at home many things wearing the name of Christian that have no right to this name, if tried by the divine standard. No doubt some phases of Christian life, as represanted by the missionaries in foreign lands, have little in common with the truest type of that life, as represented by New Testament teaching. There is no more common logical fallacy than that which makes a part equal to the whole, or that makes the imperfect representation of a thing just equal to the thing itself. This fact makes it very important to discriminate between the true and false which go under the name of Christianity; and yet, this is tne very thing that is not done by such writers as Mark Twain. He sees that the conduct of the Reverend Ament and certain Catholic missionaries is not likely to impress favorably the "persons sitting in darkness," and he immediately assumes that this is the sum total of the missionary spirit within the borders of the Chinese Empire. But such a conclusion is unworthy a man of Mark Twain's clear penetration. Still, it is just what Christians may expect, unless they utterly repudiate the false, while they vigorously maintain what is good, right and true.

What he says about our civilization is also overdone. That our government has made some mistakes in their expansion policy, no one will seriously dispute. Nor was anything else to be expected by reasonable men. We have had little experience in dealing with such problems as have recently come before our national government. But, after all, it must be said that our government in our recently acquired territories is already infinitely better than that which prevailed prior to our experiments in those lands. It is easy to pick out mistakes here and there which perhaps the government itself would not care to defend, but this ought not to blind us to the fact that the general trend of our influence in these territories is for a higher civilization than anything they have heretofore experienced. It is doubtful whether the best government in the world could effectually exclude the spirit of commercialism from the administration of affairs where there are so many temptations to sacrifice principle for the almighty dollar. No one regrets more than we do the evil which comes from fostering the liquor traffic, while, on the other hand, our government claims to be seeking to help half-civilized people into a self-respecting position. Still it is bad logic and bad government also which refuses to do well because some one will not cease to do evil. It is a law of our present state of struggle that when good is accentuated, evil becomes correspondingly active. This fact was prominently brought to the front during the personal ministry of Christ on earth. It would seem that all the powers of evil were aroused to their uttermost in order to overcome the influence of Christ's ministry. His was an effort at spiritual conquest. This brought into ceaseless activity the whole demon world. So it has ever been. Consequently, the people of God may expect opposition whenever they begin in earnest to work for a good cause. The friction in China and the Philippines is unmistakable evidence that some active energy is at work in those regions for real good. There would be no friction if it were not for the conflict between good and evil, and what is now regarded as a monstrous perversion of Christianity is, after all, a proof that genuine Christianity is making itself felt where all this evil is active. It is well, therefore, to look at all sides of the question under consideration before we are prepared to sympathize with Mark Twain's description of the situation.

Nor is the view of the Chinese Minister at Washington entirely free from objections. His recent remarks, defending a former speech he made, are eminently diplomatic, as well as very clever from his point of view. His notion is that Christianity presents too high an ideal for mortal man to realize, and consequently the religions of China are better, especially that of Confucius. Nothing could be a higher compliment to Christianity than that it is all that Mr. Wu thinks it is. A perfect religion could not give us an imperfect ideal, and one of the proofs that Christianity is divine is the superior ideal which it presents. Mr. Wu's mistake is in not being able to account for the failures of Christians to live up to the teaching of Christ on more rational grounds than those he presented in his address. Weak human nature will fail to realize the ideals of Confucius just as readily as the ideals of Christ. A low ideal will often beget low aspirations, and as a matter of fact it is easier to follow a great leader like Christ than to follow one like Confucius, for the reason that the former bears us along with an irrepressible enthusiasm toward the goal before us; while the latter's personality is practically entirely lost in the conscious fact that he speaks out of the tomb. A resurrected leader has a right to expect great things of his followers, and especially when he imparts to them life and strength in their conflict with sin. Just here is the greatness of Christianity, when compared with all other religions. It is dominated by a living personality, and this fact imparts vigor and freshness to all it is and all it does. Still it must be remembered that even this unique religion has to assert itself through very imperfect men and women, and consequently we must not be discouraged because we do not find the millennium following the flag into our newly acquired territory. We must learn to labor and to wait.

Hour of Prayer.

Vowing and Paying.*

TEXT:—Let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared.
Psalm 76:11.

A religious vow is a solemn promise or pledge voluntarily made to do a certain thing unto the Lord. It is a deliberate decision of the mind to perform certain acts as a matter of personal obligation which we are under to God because of what He has done for us and in view of our ability to do something in return for the benefit of others. Let it be admitted that the vows of the ancient time were of a somewhat different character from ours; the principle underlying them, however, is the same. The above inculcates not only the vowing but the paying of our vows unto the Lord. It is a good thing to make a good vow, provided the vow is paid; otherwise it is better not to vow. Most of us are better at vowing than at paying our vows, but some are hindered from making vows because they dislike the idea of paying them.

What Our Vows Are.

The vows we make may be classified under two general heads. One class relates to our personal conduct and character—what we will do and what we will be—and the other relates to offerings that we will make to the Lord's cause. It is natural and right that in moments of religious exaltation, when the conscience is awake to its obligations, we should promise the Lord to be more prayerful, more attentive to Bible study, more faithful in attending to all our religious duties and more careful to abstain from all conduct unbecoming a Christian. Under the same sort of religious feeling we promise to give of our means for the support of the Lord's cause either a definite sum or "according as the Lord has prospered us." Many professed Christians are very prone to neglect paying these vows unto the Lord. Especially is this true of those who decline to make any definite vow but who simply promise to give according to their ability. It is astonishing how small a per cent. of the total contributions in our churches is given by this class of members. Notice, too, the universality of the obligation to vow and pay the vow. "Let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared." This rule followed out would revolutionize the financial and spiritual condition of our churches.

One Who Vowed and Paid.

That is an instructive incident in the life of Jacob, who, when fleeing from the wrath of his brother Esau, reposing his head upon a stone one night at Bethel and seeing a vision of a ladder reaching from earth to heaven with the angels ascending and descending, recognized the presence of God. "And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, if God be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God, and this stone which I have set up for a pillar shall be God's house: and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee" (Gen. 28:20-22). This was Jacob's vow and the sequel of how he kept it and of how the Lord prospered him, is well known. Jacob demonstrated what many another man since his day has discovered, that it pays to be liberal to the Lord and that giving does not impoverish, but often tends to enrichment, as in the case of Jacob.

Public Worship.

It is not enough that in private we pay our devotions to God. It is well and helpful to others that we meet and praise God together "in the great congregation." Nor is it enough that we stealthily put a penny into the contribution box, being careful not to let our left hand know what our right hand doeth. This may apply to alms-giving but not to the payment of our vows.

"Of thee cometh my praise in the great congregation:
I will pay my vows before them that fear him." (Psalm 22:25.)

Here is the public worship consisting both in giving praise to God in the congregation and in paying our vows or pledges "before them that fear him." In this way we not only stimulate each other but we give assurance to others that we are paying our vows, a matter which they have a right to know since we are associated together in a common fellowship for carrying on the Lord's work. Here is a timely admonition to those who think they can worship at home on the Lord's day quite as acceptably as at church and who decline to make any definite financial pledge as they do not wish any one to know that they are doing anything for the support of the church. The Psalmist believed in doing both these things in the public congregation.

Promptness in Paying Vows.

Some who recognize the obligation to both make and pay their vows unto God, postpone the latter part of their obligation, sometimes indefinitely. There is a word of admonition for such which may not be as courteous in its tone as we would put it, but it lacks nothing in perspicuity. "When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou vowest. Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay" (Eccl. 5:4, 5). We are prone to promise God that we are going to do better by and by, but postpone the carrying out of this good resolution often until it is too late. The sooner we comply with a holy and righteous vow or pledge the sooner we secure the blessing that is attached to it. This is no doubt why it seemed to the wise man to be folly to defer paying our vows unto God.

The sum of all this is, vow wisely and generously; pay promptly and ungrudgingly. So shall God's blessing rest upon us abundantly and we shall rejoice in the multitude of his loving kindnesses.

Prayer.

O Thou whose goodness and tender mercies call forth from our hearts responsive vows and pledges to do Thy will in all things, grant us grace, we beseech Thee, to be faithful to our vows and especially to our solemn baptismal vow in the day when we solemnly pledged our lives to Thee and Thou didst vouchsafe to us the assurance of sins forgiven and acceptance with Thee. Lead us, we pray Thee, into a higher appreciation of our pledges to Thee and to a more prompt discharge of these obligations to the end that we may enjoy fellowship with Thee and promote the advancement of Thy kingdom in the world. In Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

It is one of the pathetic facts of human life that we never reach our ideals; never apprehend that for which we have been apprehended. The chasm between what we are and what we would like to be, what we have done and what we desire to do, ever remains. This is so, as a rule at least, in the smaller divisions of time. How often we plan more for the day, or the week, or the month, or the year, than we are able to accomplish. And when our life on earth shall end, it will find us with unfinished tasks which we had assigned ourselves, and with plans reaching out into the future which can never be carried out. How many of earth's noblest spirits have expressed themselves, at the close of life, as dissatisfied with what they have been able to do, and as having had a strong desire to accomplish some particular work which they must leave undone! This, however, but indicates the incompleteness of this present earth-life. We must remember that we are only beginning here, and that all eternity lies before us in which to carry forward the great purposes of God. If we have brought ourselves into oneness with God, and are doing what we can to perfect holiness of character and to advance his kingdom among men, we may well spare ourselves any vain regrets over the work which we have not been able to do.

This failure to realize our ideals in this life is not because of the lack of influences here to spur us onward and upward, but it grows out of the very largeness of our human nature and its capacity for endless progress. Life is too short in which to realize the fullest development of all our powers, and this, in spite of the influences that would tend to hasten our spiritual growth. As a recent writer has said, "Life is continually prodded by forces from without. Reverses in life, death, the example of a beautiful personality, ideas from other people, the demands of institutions, and the like, are among the things which shake life from its self-content and lead it into the recognition of a world larger than its own." If we hold our hearts open and susceptible to these heavenly influences so that they may play upon our lives, we can hardly fail to grow into that larger sphere of liberty, of power and of activity which it is the purpose of Christianity to confer upon men. The relationships of life, ties of family and of kin, the experiences of life—these are all divine teachers, bringing needed instruction and inspiration for our life-tasks. The failure of many comes from not learning the lessons which these experiences of life are designed to teach. Having eyes we see not, having ears we hear not, and having minds and hearts we perceive not and feel not the mighty import of God's dealings with us in the experiences which make up our lives.

But, as already intimated, we get only glimpses here of what we shall be and do hereafter. This present life is but the antechamber to the magnificent structure called by Jesus "the Father's house." What we cannot reach here we shall reach there.

> "The high that proved too high, the heroic for earth too hard,
> The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky,
> Are music sent up to God by the lover and the bard;
> Enough that he heard it once; we shall hear it by and by."

So sang Browning, and so all our hearts feel as we contemplate the things we would like to know and cannot know here, and the things we would like to be and to do which can never be realized on earth. These glimpses of things too high for us, what a stimulus they are to growth, to intellectual and spiritual expansion! And our growth is of far more value in the sight of God than our self-satisfaction. We cannot grow without pain and unrest. "One of the greatest pains," says Bagehot, "is the pain of a new idea." We frequently fail to recognize what this pain means. We often turn back from its endurance and cast the new idea away, thinking it means the undermining of things that are eternal, whereas its mission is to enlarge our horizon and free us from the narrowing limitations which shut out so much of God and of life. Not without travail of soul, not without mental throes and spiritual agony, can we enter the higher and deeper things of God. But the best things we catch visions of in this life in our better moments, are but the feeble intimations of what our eyes shall behold and what our hearts shall experience when we enter into the larger and purer life that lies beyond the vail.

Passing now from this high range of reflection to matters more terrestrial and urgent, the Easy Chair has once more become the subject of an edict. It does not come from civil or ecclesiastical powers, but from an authority no less to be obeyed. It is from the doctor—the family physician—the man who watches after the welfare of our bodies. The edict is issued in a kind and advisory tone, but its meaning is none the less clear. The editor, he says, has violated law—the law of health, and the penalty is cessation, in part at least, from mental labor, and banishment from the city southward where the sun shines more continuously and where the soft winds woo one from the house into nature's realm and where the languor of the atmosphere invites one to mental inactivity. So be it. We submit to the inevitable. But we shall take our Easy Chair along with us and a traveling companion also, who may be relied upon to see that the doctor's edict to rest is obeyed as faithfully as if it were her own! We shall aim to keep more or less in touch with the office and with our readers, whose spiritual upbuilding is the subject of our daily thought and prayer.

Questions and Answers.

Why is the term "eucharist" applied by many writers to the Lord's supper?
M. H. B.

The word "eucharist" in its Greek form is used in each of the four accounts of the institution of the Lord's supper in the New Testament. It means a thanksgiving, and in its participial form in the passages referred to, means the giving of thanks. And Jesus (laboon poteerion kai eucharisteesas) "taking the cup gave thanks." Matt. Mark gives exactly the same words. Luke says: (kai laboon arton eucharisteesas) "and taking bread he gave thanks." Paul, in his account (1 Cor. 11:23-25), says that Jesus (elaben arton kai eucharisteesas) "took bread and gave thanks." As thanksgiving was so prominently associated with the ordinance, it is not strange that it should have been designated as a "eucharist," or giving of thanks.

The Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor Society and church should be one, but they frequently manifest a tendency to become three. What is the remedy for this wrong tendency? J. C. R.

There can be no question, we think, but that there is a degree of separateness between these departments of the church very often, which is harmful to themselves and to the church, of which they are each component parts. The best remedy, we suppose, is constant emphasis of the unity of the local church in all its departments, and in seeing to it that the workers in each of these organizations shall be workers in the others. Let it be shown, too, that the Christian Endeavor pledge requires fidelity to the local church in all its regular meetings and methods of work.

Is it necessary to the proper observance of the Lord's Supper to pour out the wine from one vessel into another before the congregation? Or will it do just as well to have the goblets filled beforehand when the table is arranged? This question is suggested by your reply to J. M. Michael, January 17. W. D. Deweese.

The latter, we presume, would answer all the demands of the case. It is the distribution of the wine that is essential to a proper observance of the institution and not the time when it is poured out.

Can a man be saved without being baptized? B. J. C.

It depends upon who the man is and what are his condition and surroundings. If it is some one who knows it is a command and who concludes that he will try the experiment of being saved without obeying the command, he will be sure to fail. According to our way of thinking, he ought to fail. On the other hand, if the man happen to be one who has rendered obedience to every command within his knowledge and power, and yet, for some good reason, is not baptized, we should have no fears about his future safety. There are many who have been baptized, and yet who come so far short of living the life of Him into whom they are supposed to be baptized that one may well fear for their future. Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, neither baptism nor unbaptism, in and of itself, but a loyal, obedient spirit and a pure life, avail much in the sight of God.

Her Majesty The Queen

By FREDERICK D. POWER

"I Will be Good."

"Kings shall be thy nursing fathers and queens thy nursing mothers," said Isaiah, speaking of the religion of the promised Messiah. The whole world will concede that this was true of the gracious woman whom it mourns to-day. The life that closed at Osborne on Tuesday, January 22, was a benediction not to Great Britain merely, nor to the English-speaking people, but to mankind. The Victorian age will always stand as one of the most conspicuous in the world's annals, not only for the advancement of civilization, but for the progress of Immanuel's kingdom. For such a reign we may all reverently thank God.

Two things are uppermost as we review this remarkable history: The noble woman and the progress of her empire. The little girl, reared so simply and naturally by the Duchess of Kent, was said to be a short, plain child. When eleven years of age one of her teachers spoke of the position to which she would some day be elevated, and remarked: "There is much splendor, but more responsibility." The princess gave the teacher her hand and said simply: "I will be good!" This childish resolve has been the secret of her strength. She did not say more when, kneeling in Westminster to take the coronation oath and laying her hand on the gospels, she declared: "The things I have here before promised I will perform and keep, so help me God!" "The exaltation of royalty," said Prince Albert, "is only possible through the personal character of the sovereign."

"I Ask Your Grace to Pray for Me."

William the Fourth expired at midnight at Windsor Castle. The Archbishop of Canterbury left the king's bedside and with all possible speed made his way to Kensington palace, the residence at that time of the princess, already by law of succession Queen of England. He arrived long before daylight, announced himself, and asked an immediate interview. Robing herself hastily, the princess met the venerable prelate, who announced the death of William and informed her that in law and right she was the successor of the deceased monarch. The sovereignty of the most powerful nation on earth lay at the feet of a girl of eighteen. Queen of the only realm in history on which the sun never sets, she was deeply agitated by the "formidable words so fraught with blessing or calamity." "I ask your grace to pray for me," were her first words—words we have heard in many a humble prayer-meeting, but which in this case had a profounder meaning, and they knelt, and Victoria inaugurated her reign like the young King of Israel who asked from the Most High "an understanding heart to judge so great a people who could not be numbered or counted for multitude."

What has been the sequel? Every throne in Europe has tottered since that day; most of them for a time have been overturned, while that of England was never so firmly seated in the love and loyalty of the people as it is to-day.

"To the Queen of England."

Another incident on the same eventful night. A message was dispatched by William's queen, then become the queen dowager, apprising Victoria of the king's death, and she immediately called for paper and indited a letter of condolence to the widow, and folding it directed it" To the Queen of England." Noticing the inscription, her maid of honor said: "Your majesty, you are the Queen of England!" "Yes," was the reply, "but the widowed queen is not to be reminded of the fact first by me." What delicate consideration for the feelings of others! And this principle has governed her through the sixty-four years of her brilliant reign and won her the hearts of millions.

A Lover of Peace.

During the first years after she came to the throne, on one occasion some sentences of court-martial were presented for her signature. One was death for desertion. She read the death warrant, paused and, looking up to the officer, the Duke of Wellington, asked: "Have you nothing to say in behalf of this man?" "Nothing, your majesty; he has deserted three times." "Think again, your grace." Seeing her majesty was so in earnest about it, the duke said: "He is certainly a bad soldier, but some speak of his good character, and he may be a good man for aught I know to the contrary." "O, thank you a thousand times!" exclaimed the youthful queen, and wrote "Pardoned" in large letters across the fatal page.

Has not this spirit operated in all her reign? Was it not her interposition which averted war between England and America over the Trent affair? Did not her proposition for a conference of the great powers to settle the Luxemburg question bring peace out of impending war in Europe? Have not her woman's hand and woman's counsel in many a stormy crisis of domestic or foreign politics been all potent for righteousness and peace? She has been simply a woman, reared by a woman, yet the results of her influence are profound studies for the statesman, the philosopher and the Christian.

Family Life.

In her domestic relations her character has been one of exceptional beauty. We know not which to admire most, the queenliness of the woman or the womanliness of the queen. Dutiful daughter, loving wife, watchful mother, kind mistress, generous benefactor, exemplary Christian—she is as perfect in her womanly as in her queenly office. In speaking of her we think much less of the queen than of the woman. We look away from the glittering palace life of Windsor and London to the secluded nooks of the Highlands of Scotland. We see the little village church of Crothie, the numerous and unostentatious charities, the ardent attachment for home and husband and children, the dislike of ostentatious display, and absolute aversion for the pomp and pageantry of public life.

How simply and purely and plainly are those royal children reared; taught sewing and gardening and cooking, and that virtue not altogether performed in every home—regard for them that serve! Here is a story of two of the little English princesses who went into the room where a servant was polishing the stove grate and insisted upon helping her; and after getting possession of the brushes polished the woman's face instead of the grate. The woman was ready to faint with confusion as she encountered Prince Albert when leaving the room, and he inquired what was the trouble. Reluctantly she explained, and soon the Queen was seen crossing the court to the servant's quarters leading the two princesses. Seeking the woman, she made her daughters ask her pardon and sent them to the nearest millinery and dress establishment to purchase out of their own allowance of money a complete outfit for the soiled one.

What pictures also this woman presents of faithfulness as a wife! Read "Leaves from the Journal of Our Life in the Highlands." How happy those twenty-two years of married life! How she recalls Prince Albert's tenderness! "Dear little wife!" "Good little wife!" he would call her as he stroked her face with his wasted hand. And she tells how, three days before his death, she supported him while he took his beef tea, and how "he laid his head—his beautiful face, more beautiful than ever, is grown so thin—on my shoulder and remained a little while, saying: 'It is very comfortable so, dear child,' which made me very happy." Queen as true to womanhood as to queenhood—"glorying with the glories of her people; sorrowing in the sorrows of the lowest."

The Queen and the People.

Her first public act after her bereavement in 1863 was to visit the Military Hospital at Netley, where she walked through the wards and spoke to the sufferers. She visited the work-houses and greeted her poor people, and the schools and accepted the greetings of the children. How many of the sixteen presidents who have filled our highest office since she came to the throne have come so close in touch with the people? She tells us of her visits to the poor cottagers about her Highland home. She was a friend and a mother to them.

A gentleman living near Edinburg said to a farm servant: "Well John, did you see the Queen?" "Troth, did I that, sir." "Well, what did you think of her?" "In truth, sir, I was terribly afeared afore she come forrit. My heart was maist in my mouth. But when she came forrit I was not fraid at a'. I just lookit at her and she lookit at me, an' she bowed her head at me and I bowed my head at her."

Dr. Guthrie, when in the neighborhood of Balmoral, visited a woman who had a short time before been bereft of her husband, and tells how the queen had stood in that hut and smoothed the dying man's pillow. Left alone with him at her own request, she had sat by the bed of death—a queen ministering comfort to a servant, a queen preparing one of her humblest subjects to meet the Sovereign of us all.

Again, a clergyman at Osborne, visiting an aged parishioner, found sitting by the bed a lady in deep mourning reading the word of God. About to retire, the lady said to him: "Pray remain, I should not wish the invalid to lose the comfort which a clergyman might afford." The lady left the room and the clergyman found lying on the bed a book with texts of Scripture adapted to the sick which the lady had been reading. It was the Queen of England.

"The Queen was So Good to Us."

So she says, when consulted as to what form the great celebration of her diamond jubilee shall take: "Let it all take the shape of charity. Let your offerings be given to the poor and lowly and your aid to those who are in want and ready to perish. Let this intent govern your systematized effort to heal the inevitable inequalities of human society, so that the gifts of God in the spirit of reasonableness and mercy may be distributed among his creatures." So as she sleeps at Osborne her servants and tenants are first admitted to view her face in death, and coachmen, footmen, housemaids, stable lads and policemen, bent old men, little children and poor women, trembling with grief, throng the chamber saying: "The Queen was so good to us!"

A child of eleven years, she promised, "I will be good," and God held her to it and gave her strength, as her day, through all the dazzling brightness and depressing shadows, the glory and the sorrow of her eventful life.

Her Statesmanship.

With all this womanly tenderness, however, have been blended marvelous sagacity and good sense as a leader and sovereign. When one of her ministers urged her to sign some document on the grounds of expediency, she looked up quietly and said: "I have been taught to judge between right and wrong, but expediency is a word I neither wish to hear nor to understand." She has been no figurehead. "There is not a dispatch received from abroad or sent from this country abroad," said Disraeli, "which is not submitted to the Queen. The whole of the internal administration of the country depends upon the sign-manual of the sovereign, and her signature has never been placed to any public document of which she did not know the purport and of which she did not approve." "Her wonderful faculty of observing with absolute strictness the limits of her powers as a constitutional sovereign," said Salisbury, "and of maintaining a steady and persistent influence over her ministers, inspires the greatest admiration. No minister could disregard her views or urge her to disregard them without feeling that he had incurred a great danger. She exercised a rigid supervision over all public affairs."

And this powerful influence went out even to heathen nations. On the Treaty of Amity and Commerce between England and Madagascar occur on the margin these remarkable words: "Queen Victoria asks as a personal favor that the Queen of Madagascar will allow no persecution of Christians"!

The Secret of England's Greatness.

Noble and beautiful and just was her answer to the African prince who sent an ambassador with costly presents and asked in return the secret of England's greatness, and she answered, not with the number of England's fleets, nor the strength of England's armies, nor the amount of her boundless merchandize, the details of her inexhaustible wealth, the display of her diamonds and crown jewels, but handing him a single copy of the Bible she said: "Tell your prince there is the secret of England's greatness." And so you look over the Royal Exchange in London to-day and see carved deep in imperishable granite the Scripture: "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof."

Proudest sovereign in the world was Victoria; best sovereign, best of her line, best, morally speaking, that ever sat on the English throne. The wisdom of Elizabeth, the victories of Anne, we remember, but hers were the glories of peace, of industry, of commerce, of genius, of justice made more accessible, of education made more universal, of virtue made more honored, of religion made more beloved, holding forth the gospel light to the unawakened nations.

"England is the strongest nation because the most Christian," said Henry Ward Beecher. "It has most moral power. It has more than we have. We like to talk about ourselves on the Fourth of July. We fan ourselves with eulogies; and we are not to be compared to-day with Old England. I know her surly faults, her stubborn conceits, but taking her up on one side and down on the other, there is not a nation that represents so much Christianity as Old England." And who shall say how much of this is due to 64 years of reign on the part of this gracious, godly, motherly woman whom she calls "Her Majesty, the Queen?"

The Mother of Her Country.

To-day we think not of the sovereign, but of the woman, mother, grandmother, great-grandmother, to 400,000,000 of our race. Alexander Campbell wrote from Glasgow in 1847: "No queen of England was ever more universally popular than Victoria. She is now traveling for pleasure with her royal consort and their children through the Highlands. The enthusiasm of the Scotch is everywhere expressed in every form that can prove it comes from the heart." And he tells of the woman and mother triumphing over the queen in her yielding to some Highland women who, crowding up to the boat, demanded that she would show them "the dear little bairns," and "the Queen in great good humor first seized one little Dutchman and then another, and held them up in her arms to show them off in fine style to the ecstatic admiration and cheers of the people."

And the Queen has never lost this nearness and motherliness to the people. Some time ago a letter reached her from a little girl. The child addressed her letter to "The Dear Lady Queen," and told how her doll had fallen into a hole. She wrote she supposed the doll had gone right through, and as she had heard that the other side of the world belonged to the Queen she hoped the Queen would not find it very much trouble to give orders to have her doll returned. The quaint confidence of the child was rewarded at once.

There is nothing so well established in history, nothing that a woman does so well as to reign, and this woman has been mother and monarch to millions. To speak of the progress of her empire in these three score and four years would be to write largely the history of civilization. It is a marvelous story, the growth of the English-speaking people, the increase in population, in territory, commerce and manufactures, in wealth and intelligence, in steam power and electricity, in faith, in spirituality, in practical Christianity, in the gift of the gospel to the regions beyond, in education, in the arts and sciences, in civil and religious freedom, in the elevation of the working classes, the protection of childhood, the elevation of womanhood, in everything that makes a nation great. The ratio of pauperism has fallen from one in sixteen to one in thirty-six, and in convicts from one in three hundred and sixty to one in seven thousand. Ireland alone has stood still in all this mighty ongoing. Yet even Ireland is blessed in being permitted to move to America and provide the police force of Greater New York. The people have come to their inheritance—the people, rich and poor, old and young, male and female, noble and Plebeian, Anglican and Dissenter, Catholic and Protestant.

It is a great era, this Victorian age, from 1837 to 1901. We all share in the blessing. We all bow our heads as the Union Jack falls to half mast above her bier. We all, whether we care for crowns and royal titles or not, can love and honor a gracious Christian woman, and we can all sing with the voice that now belts the globe, "God save the King!"

What Most Interests Me Now

By J. S. LAMAR

III. Light from the New Creation

When as a boy I read the opening chapters of Genesis, I naturally thought that the earth and all things were created in six days of twenty-four hours each. Even then I could see, as taught from the pulpit and by such hand-books as fell in my way, the wisdom and goodness of God as displayed in the order of creative work—in providing food for animals and men before they were created. At that time I had looked no deeper into the earth than to the bottom of an ordinary well, and if I heard of strange bones and shells found anywhere, I accepted them as proofs of the universality of the flood. These inadequate and surface views of the subject sufficed for my youthful mind, as they did for the childhood of the world; and my ever increasing wonder is that the story could be so told that its surface meaning could teach the essential truth, and at the same time be fitted to harmonize with discoveries the most remote and researches the most profound.

As I now see it the six solar days of my boyhood's conception have expanded into "times eternal," while the momentary creative acts are linked on to processes extending back through measureless ages. Let me say here also that while I think the current theory of evolution is a mistake, an error which, as I judge, sprang from a superficial consideration of facts rather than from an insight into their deeper meaning, it is now so widely spread, and by its adherents so confidently taken for granted as an established truth, that probably only time and some master's presentation of a better one can displace it. It is not for me nor one like me to attempt this task, nor is it my purpose to do so.

Still I have my own distinct views of the subject, and, so far as I know, they are peculiarly my own. I shall not press their acceptance upon any one, nor shall I close my humble presentation of them with a triumphant and brassy quod erat demonstrandum. Whatever may be the claims and pretensions of others, I recognize that in this science it is not often safe or becoming to write Q. E. D.

Besides, as my views, strange as it may seem, spring directly from the New Testament, I can not anticipate that they will be seriously considered by those who hold to that book, if at all, by a very feeble and uncertain grasp. In presenting them here, as clearly and briefly as I can, I do so in the hope that a few of my readers may derive from them the satisfaction and comfort which they have brought to my own mind.

To bring the subject immediately before us, I remark that, beyond all reasonable doubt, there was some sort of structural and vital connection between the first man and the living creatures that preceded him. The evidence in support of this is so abundant and cogent that, to my own mind at least, it is beyond question; but whether it is to be explained and accounted for upon the theory of evolution, or in some other way, is open to question.

In the New Testament Christians are spoken of as "new creatures." All of us have heard this phrase explained as a strong figurative expression—a sort of hyperbole. And perhaps we have also heard an analogy traced between what was called the new creation and what at that time was supposed to be the process of the old creation. But in any case the effort was to explain the new by the old. Now, however, it is the old that needs explanation. If, therefore, there is anything original in my view, it arises right here: I begin by reversing the whole process. Accepting the phrase before us as expressing the literal truth, I explain the old creation, encompassed now with uncertainty and darkness, by the new, about which we know so much more, and which we understand so much better. This expresses the essence and substance of the whole matter. Without another word, the reader might apply the principle for himself; but for his convenience I will illustrate my meaning and trace the proposed process to some of its more important and luminous results.

I might instance Peter or any of the original apostles, but owing to our familiarity with his history, the apostle Paul is selected as a typical example—and one that will most clearly show how the facts in the old creation may be explained by those in the new. Of course the facts involved in this latter creation are of a different order. They belong to a different realm, to another kingdom. They are spiritual and not material. We cannot see, or handle, or measure them; but they are real, notwithstanding, and by a competent mind may be as distinctly cognized and as accurately estimated as any other facts.

Such a mind will not fail to see that the distance between Paul the apostle and Saul the persecutor is practically infinite, just as Mr. Huxley says is the distance between man and the very highest of the brute creation. It is a "gulf" which the unaided Saul could not pass in the one case, nor the unaided brute in the other. We notice, furthermore, that, immense as is the difference between Paul and Saul—a difference in life and spirit, in aspirations, hopes, fears, purposes—amounting in fact to an entire transformation of his whole inner being, still the characteristic and constitutional likenesses between "the old man" and "the new," are as marked and numerous as they are between physical man and the higher animals.

So far, then, taking Paul as a typical example of the new creation, the parallel is complete. Already the case begins to cast light into the darkness and mystery of the creative process. We know, for instance, as a matter of fact, that Paul was not the result of some accidental variation of native faculty, or of natural selection, or of special environment, or of some abnormal prenatal appetite and tendency on the part of his parents. All of these, whatever they might have been, could only make him Saul—neither one nor all of them made him Paul.

In brief, the bitter and relentless persecutor was born by natural generation; the holy apostle was not. He was a new creation. And this is just as really, though perhaps not so obviously, true of the other apostles. They were all re-created in Christ, to be the progenitors of a new and higher order of beings, who, by virtue of their parentage, should also be in Christ, and be equally "new creatures" in him.

This language may sound somewhat unfamiliar, but the fact, otherwise expressed, is among the commonplaces of Scripture teaching. It is well known that their maker gave to his apostles so much of his creative energy as to make them—instrumentally, of course, and by virtue of his abiding presence and power—not creators, certainly, but *pro*creators. And as a simple historical fact thus it was that the first Christian family was enlarged, extended and perpetuated.

But let us not fail to observe that this was the limit of their procreative power. It could introduce no higher order of being. Paul could beget Christians among the Corinthians, and so become their spiritual father, but he could not beget angels. In like manner the first created man was empowered and required to multiply himself, so to speak—to beget sons in his own likeness—but that was the end. By no possibility could he, like Paul, beget a "new creature." In order to do this he must first himself have been created anew, and have been given the seed of a higher life and a divine nature.

Possibly the example in hand will still further illuminate the facts and process of creation. For instance, even if we had no other data in hand, I should infer from the antitype—the new creation—that the first man was made of pre-existing material. And this would equally accord with the teaching of Moses, whether we interpreted the "dust" in Genesis as meaning common earth, or that same material as being already organized in some existing vital structure. I know of no reason to reject the latter alternative, which is intrinsically the more probable. I should suppose, indeed, that in the last act of the physical creation, the Creator would select, as material for the new being about to be made, some creature which he had previously formed, and which must clearly indicate the archetypal idea which he had been gradually unfolding in all antecedent creations; an archetype which in the divine purpose was at last to be fully realized and revealed in "the new creation in Christ Jesus." Nor does it matter what pre-human creature was selected as the basal material in the creation of man. It might have been a gibbon, a gorilla, an ape, or some other creature. In any case it was confined by its very nature and constitution to its own plane of existence, and it could go no higher. By no possibility could it become man or produce man. I can find no train, whether called natural selection, development, generation, or what not, that runs from brute to man. The natural passage is really and soberly unthinkable. The gulf to be crossed is immensely wide and deep. My mind is afraid to pass over it upon a bridge of ingenious fancies and assumptions.

I will not assert, for I do not know, that when it pleased God to introduce the human race into the infinite stream of his eternal purpose, he selected a full-grown pair of the highest animals and by a creative act made them over again—transforming them not new beings, with a constitution and capacity fitted to receive and utilize the high endowment which he bestowed upon them. While I do not dogmatically affirm this, I do claim that it is thinkable and reasonable, and that it harmonizes with the deepest truth known to our hearts and the highest revelation made to our faith. The same principle, applied to all antecedent creatures, will equally explain at once the upward and interlinked progress, which throughout the whole succession is so clearly disclosed—and do this without resorting to assumptions which are so offensive to logical minds.

I do not pretend to be the first who has suggested successive creations as an explanation of the facts of which I have been speaking. But those who have done so seem to have thought, if I remember correctly, of distinct and independent creations, so making the continuity of the creative progress one of mental conception rather than of fact. Such ideas could not be strung upon my thread; nor could they satisfy the evolutionist, who clearly sees and assumes to account for a real and actual connection between the lower and higher classes of living creatures.

My ideas may have little or no value, but at any rate they are peculiarly my own in this—that I start with the new creation, the last and the highest, and extending my thread back through the first man to the infinite multitudes of living creatures that preceded him, I account for the existence and coming of them all upon the same principle, and bind them all together by the same tie.

My reader will pardon me for saying that I am glad to believe that I am a new creature in Christ; but I also rejoice to be able to see, as in some dim way I think I can, that every living thing in all the past was also in some sense created in him, and by him, and for him. And by thus distributing while at the same time unifying the prologue of the fourth gospel, it seems to shine in my mind as a brighter light, and to sound in my heart as a diviner harmony.

Evolution at Bartlett's Landing

By BURRIS A. JENKINS

CHAPTER IV CONCLUDED.

One evening in spring, Bartlett sat on the low step at the door of Widow Booth's little cabin. He had laid aside the broad-brimmed white hat, and was mopping his high, bald forehead. He had put in the afternoon making garden for the widow, and the smell of burning brush, of raspberry and grape, yet hung fragrantly in the air. He never made garden for himself. There were enough others for that about his place. But the widow's garden—that was different, and in it there was pleasure for him.

Many a time, that afternoon, the richness of her little farm had been a joy to him. The cabin had been built on an island, separated from the Clay county shore by a shallow strip of river. Her husband had "squatted" on the island; and when, as often happens in that capricious river, the stream changed, and the narrow channel was left dry, the squatter naturally fell easy heir to a fine bit of ready-cleared, rich bottom-land. Its only drawback was the danger of spring floods, but the spot where the cabin stood had not been submerged since the famous flood of fifteen years ago.

Now, as the Elder sat on the doorstep in the gathering darkness, it was with the comfortable confidence of a rich yield for the widow's ground. Like all deeds of kindness his labor was sweet; and he lingered before swinging into the saddle for home. The bees before the one hive crawled about their little bit of a public square, cooling themselves, courting, singing and exchanging experiences of the day's hunt, and were hummingly content. The children, tired with the brush-burning, in which all day they had played the important part of hindrance, were fast asleep. Ben, the oldest, now ten, had gone down the road to drive the new cow, the Elder's gift, up from the further lot.

"Ben will soon be old enough to run the place, Elder," said the widow from the bench beside the door; and her face looked as different from its appearance on that December night as did the green elm tree by her gate from its wintry aspect.

"Yes, and he's a good boy, Sarah," said the Elder, musing, possibly, on another ten-year-old he had fathered long ago.

"That he is," replied the widow enthusiastically; then poured forth a stream of commendation on all the five. What mother is there who is temperate in judgment of her own—especially when she must be mother and father, too?

Meantime the Elder still mused. Suddenly he said:

"Sarah, how long since your other friend was here?"

The widow, brought up with a round turn, laughed a bit oddly and replied:

"O, a week, about; yes, just a week today."

"Does he come at regular times?" enquired he, reaching for his hat.

"Well, no, not exactly; that is, sometimes he's regular and sometimes irregular, you see."

"Ah, I see."

"He usually is here once a week helping Ben to read, and bringing him a book now and then. Ben isn't much at readin', I guess, but Eld—that is, he likes to try to interest him."

"Books—m-m-m!" murmured Bartlett, then muttered below his breath "Pure religion and undefiled—"

"Eh? How, Bro. Bartlett?"

"I was just sayin' that the man, whoever he is, can't be far from the Kingdom of Heaven."

"Far from the Kingdom of Heaven? My land! I should say not. Last Saturday he was planting' some flowers for me, when one of them Seventh Day Advertisers—"

"Adventists, Sarah."

"Yes, yes, Adventists—come along with a big Bible, and a bigger head, and he says, says he, 'Do you expect ever to git to heaven workin' and breakin' the Sabbath?' 'Why yes,' says he, kind o' laughin' to himself, 'I'm in heaven now.' Then that Advertiser went off mighty hot under the collar."

Horses' hoofs, in a long swinging gallop, interrupted the talk, and a boy's merry shout mingled with the sound. Two short, tight-drawn leaps and the horse halted before the gate.

"There, Ben," said a deep, musical bass, as a large man swung the boy from the crupper to the ground, and strode in at the gate.

The widow rose from her seat into the light streaming from the open door, and greeted the newcomer with an unusually merry eye. Meanwhile, Bartlett, too, had risen.

"Henry!"

"Elder!" with unmistakable affection in the two words.

Both stood embarrassed. Then the widow put in—for women were schemers ever—

"I must jest go and clear up the supper dishes. You'll excuse me a little. Set down, brethren, here on the bench. Plenty of room, even on my little bench, for two sech men as you. It's beautiful to see brethren dwellin' together in unity—a-ministerin', too, to fatherless and widows in their affliction."

And the corner of her apron met the corner of her eye, as she moved into the house. But the tear had scarce been dashed aside when a shrewd and happy smile spread over her face.

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings—" murmured the Elder. "This simple woman has spoke truth, Henry, boy."

"Yes, Father Bartlett. Blessed are the peacemakers."

"No, no, Henry. I have never cherished enmity against you."

What matters what they said that warm, blessed night, to the low hum of the bees and the soft breath in pine and elm? What matters what they said as they rode home in the starlight—the agreement they reached, each to think his own thoughts and love his own loves?

As they reached the cross-roads near his mother's little farm, Henry said:

"I'll turn off here to mother's. Will you please tell Jane I'll be up to see her in an hour—if—if I may, Elder?"

For the third time we shall see, if we lean over, the stars of the night sunken in the shallow well. There on the stile sits a woman, all in white, in the strength and beauty of full womanhood. Her face is turned toward the horizon, where the round moon, rising, sends level rays across the world.

Henry's eyes, as he sits by her side, are turned the same way. Henry's great hands hold hers folded, and he says:

"When shall it be, Jane?"

"When you say, Henry; I am ready."

"Then I say when that moon is full again."

"Very well. Let us go in now. Father must be waiting for his gourd, though he has far better refreshment for his soul tonight than I can bring him." And she smiled.

It was half an hour, however, ere they did go in. Then they stole up behind the old man's chair to find his tears falling fast on the seventeenth chapter of John.

"Henry, there's nothing in it about differing views. Seems strange, doesn't it?"

[THE END.]

The Autobiography of an Urchin.

By Ben Greenstein.

All biographies contain a pedigree. Since heredity plays an important part in all human activities, let me begin my story by introducing you to my parents. They were born in the monarchy of Austro-Hungary near the city of Szegedin. They were simple, agricultural Jewish peasants who lived in the country. My father was educated in the little private school superintended by a professional rabbi or teacher.

Nearly all male Jews are educated in these schools and by this kind of men, and—they educate with a club. Many have wondered at the remarkable tenacity and obstinancy that are exhibited by the Jewish people in all their history. The reason is easily comprehended. These pious men narrate many fanciful and legendary stories concerning the Man of Nazareth, which the children swallow whole, without a single objection, at that tender age when they are incapable of controversy.

Many of these stories are too filthy for print and the others are too amusing for sober thought. But they are instilled into the children at a tender age, and it is exceedingly difficult to extricate ourselves from the fancies of childhood. But thank God who in his wise providence withheld my ears from these stories until they could not have any effect on me.

There was a terrible commercial depression throughout the Hungarian labor ranks, and it was very hard to make a living, so my parents came to this country under romantic circumstances, nearly 20 years ago. They lived in one of those moldering, filthy, half-ventilated, bad-smelling tenement houses for which New York has become noted—at least it was so at that time. In the midst of filth, ignorance, vice, obscurity, I was born on July 11, 1883. I grew up like all the other children, on the streets, devoid of home training. Poverty is not congenial to domestic education. I remember playing near the river around a big molasses factory where we used to take a long straw and suck the molasses that remained on the bottom of the barrel. Like Mrs. Stowe's Topsy, I "jest grew up."

After a few years we went West to try our fortune there, because the tailoring business (my father's trade at that time) was being ruined by the intense competition of middlemen. We arrived in St. Louis in December, 1892, and settled in a district where almost all the inhabitants were negroes. My first companion was a negro boy. In the course of time I almost lived with the colored people.

Association means assimilation, and I began to be like my Ethiopian companions, wild, self-willed, of a roving disposition. Of course this kind of life was not favorable to my mental and moral life. I would go to school when I liked and when I did not like I would not go. I never reached even to this day the sixth grade, but I was a reader by natural inclination. I loved to read books and sat many a night in the small hours reading a dime novel. Jesse James was my patron saint. What a hero he was to my imagination as I would read an account of one of his daring hold-ups. I read an immense amount of evil literature.

One day while walking around the city, I came across a dime museum, and in the course of time became acquainted with the manager and the company of actors. I began to play minor parts on the stage in some "blood and thunder" show, then I used to sing on what they called "Amateur Nights" the latest songs of the day. I remember also acting as a clown for a whole week for the immense salary of 75 cents. Finally I degenerated from clowning to "rushing the growler" and became quite an adept in the latter art. I learned many bad things in this vile place, until it broke up.

My parents tried to send me to school (Jewish), but I would invariably run away from it. I thank God that I did, because my Jewish prejudices might have been cultured to such an extent as to forbid my accepting Christianity. I did attend a Unitarian mission school, but I am quite sure that no religious idea ever entered my head from that source. Again I occasionally dropped into a Roman Catholic church out of mere curiosity, but I failed to comprehend its significance. Then I used to attend occasionally a Jewish synagogue, but as its services were conducted entirely in Hebrew I failed to understand its meaning.

Here I was, a boy who never saw a Bible to know it from any other book; who never had a single clear religious idea. The only approach to one was, one day when I hid myself in a large box, wondering if God saw me in my hiding place.

In January, 1896, there was a man sent from God whose name was John G. Stewart, a minister of the Presbyterian faith, who was expelled on account of certain heresies, but who nevertheless remained faithful to the cause of Christ. He started a church of his own after leaving the "Christian Alliance" people, called the "First Full Bible Church." He had a peculiar interest in the Jews and showed his interest by conducting a mission in a private house inhabited by a lonely colored woman who was heartily in sympathy with the proposed work. The meeting, although originally intended for the Jews, was attended by Christians of a darker skin than ourselves, and of course the Jews, true to their modern pharisaical training, would have no dealings with "de niggers." I, as the playmate of negro children, would go where they went, do what they did, eat where they ate, and live where they lived. A little playmate of mine, a colored lad of about 10 years of age, named Carl Roberts, invited me to attend with him that evening a religious meeting and after eating my supper with him I went. The singing attracted my boyish attention and I went another time until the following service they gave a general invitation to come to the "mourners' bench." Then a man came (he was a converted Roman Catholic) and asked me personally to go with him to the altar. I went, not knowing what I was doing, because I saw others go, and also because I did not like to refuse the gentleman's invitation.

Thank God he can save a poor ignorant boy like me. After the prayer service was over, the leader gave me a small pocket edition of the New Testament. Providence now took my strong but hitherto perverted desire for reading and used it for the reading of his own word.

I read that book through, and another time, until its stories fascinated me and impressed its beauty on my humble mind. I had a very good memory, which astonished many older Christians.

My parents were entirely ignorant of the fact that we were converted; they did not know that we even attended church. My brother started with me at the same time, but under parental threatenings turned his back on the grace that he had found. One day brother and I had a little quarrel, as brothers will have sometimes. As I had gotten the best of him, he vowed vengeance in a rather dramatic tone of voice. To "get even," as he said, he let the cat out of the bag, and from that day to this my domestic relations have been exceedingly unpleasant.

One of my first trials was the burning of the little Testament to which I had by this time become attached. I was sitting beside a stove reading it when my brother spitefully told my mother what book I was reading. Instantly she snatched it and threw it into the fire, but I managed to rescue my little treasure before much damage was done to it.

Again, my father forbade me to enter a Christian church, but I did not care for his mandate and went anyhow. He got wind of it in some way, and ordered me out of the house; I stayed out until my mother asked me to return. Then I went to church by lying and even stealing. One day I asked my mother to give me a nickel. She thought I wanted it to ride to church, but I declared that I would not go to church, and to prove it I went to the candy store and bought two cents' worth of candy and showed it to her, leading her to believe that I had spent the whole nickel. But in fact I rode to church on the remaining three cents, which was a child's fare.

I had studied a great deal until some one lent me a book called "Eternal Life," by Rev. Pettingell, which taught that man was not naturally immortal but that only through Christ could man ever be immortalized. I read the book and imbibed its teachings and wrote an article on it and presented it to the St. Louis Republic. The reporter thought it was something entirely new, when in reality it was as old as Chrysostom, and gave me a sensational "write-up." An Adventist preacher reading it in an Illinois town came to St. Louis to see such a "remarkable" boy who could contend with "learned doctors of divinity," and on that same day I went up to preach in his church for five days, and then I had to go to a larger church to finish up my meetings. After returning home I received a letter telling me to come up to Mendota, Ill., to an Adventist camp-meeting. They sent me the money and I went up there and preached to them on the subject of "Science and Conditional Immortality." Think of it! An ignorant boy from the slums preaching on such a profound subject! It makes me laugh now every time I think of it, but they seemed to be well pleased with it, and then, under the inspiration of a large crowd, I announced my advent to Adventism. Then they sent me through their theological factory.

After two years I was graduated and came home, where I got under the teaching of Rev. Dr. K——, who was kind enough to lend me certain books that turned the tide of my bald materialism into a living faith in the spirituality of God and man. It took nearly a year to shake off the materialistic shackles of Adventism.

What am I doing? How am I getting along in my Christian life? Five years ago I did not know one thing intelligently about Christianity. Now I can read anything in English on any department of religion and theology and understand it. I have overcome so far in the strength of God the natural obstacles of environment and my greatest impediment, Semitic heredity. I expect to go to one of the best colleges in this state. Truly the Lord has been good to me.

The Martyrs of 1900.

By William Remfry Hunt.

In the terrible massacres and persecutions in China, some 150 missionaries are known to have been killed, while 63 are still missing. Tens of thousands of native Christians have died for the testimony of Jesus. Nor is the end yet. Before their martyrdom the missionaries were hunted and hounded into caves and the mountains like wild beasts. They are those "of whom the world was not worthy."

O'er seas and lands, from kindred far,
To Sinim's peopled plain,
They bore the torch of truth and light,
Nor shed its wealth of love in vain.
Behold! the rising of His star
Breaks up the Asian night.

Wondrous the love, they sang it o'er,
That sent us in His name,
To preach the riches of His grace,
And tell the heathen Jesus came
To liberate our fallen race
And these on Sinim's shore.

In perils oft, in wanderings drear,
In caves, on mountain side,
In deserts pressed by alien horde,
In court and mart by mandate tried,
Nor did they sword or scourging fear.
Brave witnesses of God.

'Neath spear and headsman's ax, their lot,
Our brothers, sisters, died,
And clouds of witnesses did see,
As angels succored by their side,
Of whom the world was worthy not;
O holy company.

Those all too short though fruitful years
In China's storm-swept field,
Sealed though it be with blood to-day,
Seed to the Kingdom's life must yield:
Then, Savior, be with us who stay,
Thyself dispel our fears.

Jesus, who thus didst bear the cross,
To save this world of woe,
Did not thy sufferings suffice?
Why here this other cross bestow,
And seeming grant thy cause the loss?
Tell us the secret, Christ.

"O Savior God, forgive," they prayed,
"They know not what they do;"
So we repeat this song divine,
Before Thee, Jesus Master, too;
That through our lives it may be said,
"Thy will be done," not mine.

All hail! with palm and crown, in white,
Robed now before the throne,
They worship and adore and praise,
Nor think of heat, or thirst or lone
But bask in the eternal light
Through the eternal days.

Light of the ages, be adored!
Exalt Thy blood-stained sign!
Till all the sons of darkness see
The brightness of Thy glory shine;
Till earth redeemed shall own Thy word
And worship only Thee.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Colorado is a great mission field—great in the extent of its territory, great in the character of its population, great in what it promises in the way of results. The present is a time of beginnings. Foundations are being laid. What is done now will determine the future of "the Centennial state." If it is won for Christ now it will be an incalculable power for righteousness in time to come. The population is, at present, comparatively small—only about 600,000—but it is rapidly increasing. The growth of the population from 1890 to 1900 was about 27 per cent. And the immigrants to Colorado are in the main above the average in intelligence, industry, frugality and morality. They are native Americans and Potestant in their sympathies and affiliations. The Roman Catholic Church is not strong in this state. The new settlers in Colorado are persons who come to secure homes for themselves and their children. They are not wealthy. Many are really poor, but their financial condition will improve. There is no more fruitful field on the continent than this country, the Switzerland of America, for Christian work. Men in Colorado attend church better than do men in Massachusetts. The minds of the people are open. The associations of former years have been broken up, new ties have not yet been formed. Everything is new. Now is the time to work. Do I exaggerate?

The Congregationalists will expend in Colorado this year $10,850 in aiding weak churches and in planting new ones. This $10,850 comes from the American Congregational Home Missionary Society, the Congregational society that corresponds with our American Christian Missionary Society. How much money does the American Christian Missionary Society put into this promising field? Not a dollar.

An agreement was entered into some years ago between the American Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions by which Colorado became the field of the last named organization. It would, therefore, be hardly proper for the American Christian Missionary Society to expend money in this field, or to send evangelists into it. Colorado belongs to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in our organized aggressive work.

But this Board sends into the state only $1,500. This may, I believe, be increased $500, conditionally. Is this a complaint? By no means—not at all. The generosity of the C. W. B. M. is fully appreciated by the Disciples of Christ in Colorado. Read this, if you please, with an unusual emphasis. The auxiliaries in connection with our churches in Colorado sent to the Christian Woman's Board at Indianapolis, last year, more than $800. If you only knew these churches, how weak they are and how they are struggling, you would say: "That is a liberal offering." But we will do better this year.

If the Congregational brethren did not regard Colorado as a promising field do you think they would place in it, this year, almost $11,000? The men who manage the missionary enterprises of the Congregational denomination are far-sighted, shrewd, successful business men. They have learned by experience where to place money to secure the most satisfactory results.

But this $10,850 is only a part of the investment of the Congregationalists in Colorado this year. There are a number of well-to-do Congregational churches in the state. They will, by their contributions, add materially, I do not doubt, to this sum. This $10,850 is distributed among thirty-eight needy congregations. The Disciples distribute the funds placed in their hands in this state through the Board of the Colorado Christian Missionary Society among about the same number of feeble congregations.

The Disciples of Christ have in Colorado only ten self-supporting churches. They are: The Central, the Highlands, the Berkeley and the South Broadway in Denver; the Central in Pueblo; the Congregations in Boulder, Colorado Springs, Ft. Collins, Longmont and Salida. The churches at Boulder, the seat of the State University, Ft. Collins, the seat of the State Agricultural College, of which, by the way, B. O. Aylesworth is president, Longmont and Salida, have become self-supporting within the last two years. From this you can see that we are making substantial progress and that the Christian Woman's Board has not expended its money for naught in Colorado.

Can we learn anything from the Congregationalists? Indeed we can—if we only will! They founded Colorado College in Colorado Springs. This institution received a charter in 1873 and was opened in 1874. It has been reorganized since 1888, and its standard of work is now the same as the best eastern colleges. The plant is worth a million dollars. I saw President Slocum a few days ago and he told me that there are now in the college 547 students. Already the graduates of this institution are taking prominent places in the state in educational work, in business and in the various professions. The influence of Colorado College is incalculable in the future of this state.

Do you know how great is the extent of our territory? Compare it with some of the great states in the middle west. The number of square miles in Illinois is 56,000, in Indiana 35,000, in Iowa 55,000, in Ohio 40,000, in Colorado 103,000. How small your great states (and they are great) of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa and Ohio, seem when placed along side of Colorado.

"But you have not the population," I hear you say. "Evangelistic work is for people, not for square miles." True. But the people are coming and they are coming rapidly. The states above named had, to put it mildly, no larger population when they were only twenty-five years old than Colorado now has.

And almost all that I have said concerning Colorado may be said with equal truth and pertinency of Wyoming, Montana and Idaho. These are the great Rocky Mountain states. Of the states on the Pacific coast I do not speak.

I have two good words for the Disciples of Christ. I have not seen them in any of our papers.

The Independent (New York) says in its "Religious Statistics for 1900:" "The Disciples of Christ show the most remarkable growth. The figures of the membership for the census were 641,051; the latest available are 1,149,982, very nearly double. It is also the denomination that has branched out most widely in its church efforts, both in the line of church extension and of distinctively church education, which may account in a degree at least for its growth."

The Boston Herald says in an article on The Growth of the Churches: "Disciples of Christ began as a denomination long after the century did, and their membership long since passed the 1,000,000 mark. As for property accumulation that exceeds $16,000,000."

The Herald also says that the Disciples spent last year in the aggregate in sustaining and carrying forward their work, $7,856,800.

Some Literary Tendencies

By W. D. HOWE
Professor of English Literature in Butler College

There is a saying that centuries, like magazines, come out before their date. Nevertheless, it is well to stop at such a turning-point in the calendar and consider some of the tendencies in the literature of the present time.

If we go to the pages of Ryland's Chronological Outlines of English Literature, we shall discover in the first half of the nineteenth century the names of Scott, Jane Austen, Thackery, Dickens, Eliot, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Keats, Byron, Shelley, Browning, Tennyson. These names indicate tendencies. In America, at the turning of the century there had lived, with the exception of Brockden Brown, not a single truly literary man, yet the first half of the century brought forth into the literary firmament many stars of considerable brilliancy. At the end of the century, on both sides of the Atlantic, great and striking differences are noticeable.

In poetry perhaps the least encouraging sign is to be observed. We look in vain for a Shelley with his sweep of imagination, for a Keats with his beauty of color, for a Wordsworth with his love of nature, though accompanied by its mysticism, for a Browning with his depths and vigor, for a Tennyson with his melody of verse. These have fallen and who have stepped into the breach? Within the past decade, exclusive of Tennyson, little has been produced of the first order except the "Recessional" of Kipling. Yet Kipling is, in my opinion, not a poet of the first order. Though his poems have ring and movement, they are rhetorical, like the poetry of Byron, rather than deeply imaginative. They lack the high truth and seriousness that Arnold maintains should belong to the highest class of poetry. Perhaps the best way to recognize the quality which is lacking in poetry of the present is by comparison with such pieces as "Ancient Mariner," "Ode to a Nightingale," "Hymn on the Vale of Chamouni," those excellent touchstones of the first quarter of the last century.

The poetry of to-day wants inspiration. There is a metallic quality or a carelessness of the spasmodic school represented by the poetry of Arthur Hugh Clough. There is little attempt to interpret life in a truly universal way. Besides the form is rough and irregular with a minimum of melody and harmony. The last few years have produced nothing more full of promise than the tragic drama of Stephen Phillips, "Paola and Francesca." This play comes nearer than any work of the time to having the classic simplicity and dignity together with a suggestiveness altogether admirable. The imagination is lofty and breathes of the heights. The spiritual quality is prominent.

The mention of these few pieces will surely impress upon us the fact that these are not years of poetry. It does not require a false prophet or a pessimistic critic to see little promise for poetry at the present time.

Nobody reads poetry, you say. But why? Was it always that people so neglected contemporary poetry? Most certainly not. The poetry of to-day seems to give us no adequate expression of life—its ideals, its hopes, its struggles and its aspirations.

Every great literature has produced a great epic. America has not had its epic, a poem knitting more closely together the various ideas that compose the heterogeneous American life. Such a work would probably spring from the south or the far west. Besides, there is need for the poets to describe the nature of America, the romantic life of the south or many a sequestered nook in every part of the country. Then there is the relation of man to man which, outside of Whitman, has found little definite expression in the poetry of America.

When we turn to fiction, we find conditions different. We have no reason for complaining at the quantity yet there is a great difference of opinion as to the value of the great number of novels daily turned out to the willing public. The question for the literary analyst is certainly a grave one. Some critics take courage, because the number of readers has so increased. They are confident that the readers will get here and there some gold among the dross. On the other hand, there are those who are so simple in their tastes as to prefer a volume of Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Eliot, Jane Austen, Hawthorne, to the host of modern novels that pass with the day. Yet these persons of simple taste are called "old fogy" and are admonished to come out of their shells and live in the age of sensation, the age of thrills! and "to be modern." The practical age demands it, we are told. And so we hurry along, steaming through the morning's novel as we are carried to and from business. If we have not read the last book which has held its place a whole week in the show window of our book store, we are tabooed by the members of our social set.

It is not difficult to observe a few tendencies at work in fiction, especially in America, which now seems to offer a most fertile field for this kind of literature.

In the first place, the short story which, a few years ago, seemed destined to sweep everything before it, has now dropped back to its normal position. One of the most widely read of the books of the past few years, "Hugh Wynne," was a story in two volumes.

The historical novel has recently come into a prominence which it will scarcely be able to maintain. From present indications it would seem that the future novel of America will be the story of romance dealing with American life with an American setting. Whether this will be historical we cannot foretell.

The tendency at present is slightly in favor of the novel of incident rather than the novel of character, although there have been in the last year or two certain clever sketches of character. There is a dearth of novelty of plot. Over and over again we have impressed on our minds the old saw that there are only seven stories under the sun. Especially is this true of the modern drama. Probably the most discouraging feature of this modern fiction as a whole is its style. There is too little care in the name of expression, it is too easy and bears the stamp of haste or of crudeness. The novels show that for their language they do not go back to the prose of the Bible, the book which has so deeply influenced every great writer of English prose.

We should not, however, carp too much at the style of these novels. Many people are led by them to higher things. More people read to-day than ever before. Our exhortation is that we should not be engrossed by the light fiction so that we have not time for or care for the writers who have proved themselves worthy. One well-read man of our acquaintance had the habit, when a new book was much talked of, to take down from his library an old book and re-read it.

There are two forms of literature which to my mind are to-day exerting the widest and most wholesome influence. The first is the essay—moral and critical—showing a finish of style, a breadth of knowledge, a fineness of spirit which breathes of the atmosphere of Lamb, DeQuincey, Hazlitt. Such writers as Mabie, Van Dyke and Woodberry in America, Dowden, Lang and Birrell in England, are surely doing their part to maintain the standard of English and to stem the tide of the commonplace.

Second, the editorial articles of the great newspapers are wielding a wonderful influence in matters of style in keeping our eyes upon the great in literature and insisting upon the importance of literature to life. And these two literary forms wield their influence chiefly because they have not departed from the way of the fathers.

As we, then, survey the present, though there are many things which the purist in style or language will condemn, many things which the lover of Browning, Tennyson, Scott, Thackeray, Eliot, Lamb, does not care for, yet this is true. More people to-day are touched by the various literary forms; literature still has its hold on the world.

By it men are moved to action; by it men are quieted and comforted; in its various forms every one can find something to like, something which shows life in some of its manifestations. As life increases in complexity, it becomes increasingly difficult to look at it in that purely universal way which is wont to be the characteristic of the world's classics. How can we pierce through to the great truth which underlies all human experience, when we are hourly busied with the clutter of little truths, the details of our particular and varying experiences? The many-sidedness of modern life may make forever impossible the old-fashioned classic, which mirrored life not as a thing of sides but as a thing of universal characteristics.

There are in the past many things which we may all like, some things in the present. What is literature, only time will tell, for "literature is the lasting expression in words of the meaning of life." At all events we should like some book or some author, or we shall be like the cripple who boasted to Talleyrand that he could not play whist. The French statesman rather haughtily replied, "What a wretched old age you have prepared for yourself!"

Current Literature.

It would be difficult to ask a more fundamental question than that which is made the theme of the recent book by W. J. Russell, namely, "What is Your Life?" (Christian Publishing Company. $1.) Mr. Russell is yet a young man and he throws into the addresses which make up this book all the enthusiasm, the high ideals, the lofty aspirations which belong to young manhood at its best. No one can talk to young men's hearts quite so well as a young man. There is a glowing optimism, a sublime reaching out after the highest and the best, and an all-conquering hope which commend it to the heart of the young. This latest work of Mr. Russell deals with a class of themes which appeals directly to the best inspirations of young men and women. It comprises gems of thought and of literature from the ablest writers of the past and the present. Such themes as "The Value of Time," "The Body and Good Health," "Intellectual and Moral Culture," "Character Building," "The Value and Power of Enthusiasm," "Christian Citizenship," "Good Books and Reading," etc., suggest the general character of the work. It would be difficult to name a volume that would be more helpful to put into the hands of the young than this book of Mr. Russell, and we commend it to all who are seeking the means of intellectual quickening and of moral and spiritual growth.

The seeker after a light and graceful narrative of western travel, containing much novelty but no straining after novelty, will find it in a A Woman Tenderfoot, by Grace Gallatin Seton-Thompson. As the wife of the well-known naturalist, she has the advantage of a good guide in her camping trips in the Rockies, but she has eyes of her own and a pen of her own. Her descriptions are womanish and her emotions are distinctly feminine. There are pictures on almost every page. Altogether, it is the sort of book that makes you want to go and do likewise, and the author is kind enough to give some practical suggestions which will be of value to anyone in whom this desire becomes a definite purpose. (Doubleday, Page & Co.)

More February Magazines.

The series of articles dealing with the reconstruction period, now appearing in the Atlantic Monthly will constitute probably the most important contribution that has yet been made to the understanding of that complicated period of American history. The series will continue throughout the year. Gerald Stanley Lee, who, so far as style is concerned, is perhaps the most brilliant essayist now contributing to American periodicals, has an article on Making the Crowd Beautiful. His preceding essays have dealt with the proposition that our present civilization is built upon the "crowd principle"—that people work in crowds and think in crowds and amuse themselves in crowds and that this fact must work a change in our ideals of art as well as in our industrial and commercial methods. But while the dominance of the crowd produces a difficult situation as regards æsthetics, it is not quite hopeless and he considers now the question which from this point of view is fundamental to present day art: how to make the crowd itself beautiful. Goldwin Smith contributes an article on Lord Rosebery's recent "Napoleon: The Last Phase," which is not wholly favorable to Lord Rosebery and is still more harshly uncomplimentary to the subject of his book, especially in his last phase at St. Helena, where the essential littleness of the man came out in his stubborn maintenance of the empty forms of royal state, which to a nobler soul would have been mere mockery when all his power was gone.

Henry Norman's article on Central Asia in Scribner's is so far the best of his series on Russia of To-day. He describes a journey on the Russian Trans-Caspian railway, which begins on the eastern shore of the Caspian Sea and runs east nearly 2,000 miles parallel with the northern border of Afghanistan. It traverses the country where, if anywhere, Russia will begin her great move against India. Thomas F. Millard, writing on Punishment and Revenge in China, scores the Germans for keeping up military operations when there was no enemy and literally "making war" where no war existed. "The taking of Pao Ting Fu was a job for a sergeant and a squad of police. Yet it was magnified into a campaign fit to baptize a field marshal's baton." If his statements in regard to the looting and other atrocities of the allied troops are correct, there is more reason why the Powers should pay an indemnity to China than the reverse. The same magazine contains another of Hornung's Amateur Cracksman stories and more pictures of French chateaux by Peixotto. Carolyn Wells writes on the Sense of Nonsense, with dozens of quotations from the classic nonsense poems.

The North American Review will go far toward relieving itself of the reputation for undue seriousness if it continues to keep Mark Twain to the front as conspicuously as in the present number. The leading article is a sarcastic arraignment of the policy of our administration and the present British administration and every other administration that has a war on hand. It is highly readable but not convincing. Much better is the argument which Gen. Harrison has been conducting in the same magazine and to virtually the same end. In the present number Gen. Harrison writes learnedly and pleasingly of several things under the title, Musings upon Current Topics. The John Marshall centennial is celebrated by an article by Senator Lodge. Perry Belmont's consideration of the plight of the Democratic party issues in the propositions that after all the situation is not so bad, that victory has before now come out of worse defeat, and that the mission of the Democratic party now, as ever, is to act as a restrainer upon the power of the federal government. Mr. Howells writes an appreciative study of the work of Mark Twain.

Better than almost any other magazine—in fact better than any other magazine—the Critic helps one to know what people of brains are saying in their new books and what other people of brains think about it all. The current number, besides the usual pages of notes, comments and pictures of and about literary people and the usual pages of brief notices of new books, contains more or less elaborate articles in review of An Englishwoman's Love Letters, Lord Rosebery's Napoleon, Professor Gates' Studies and Appreciations, and Howells' Literary Friends and Acquaintance. There is an article on the work of Sir John Tenniel, who has completed a half century of service as cartoonist on Punch. As the author of many bitter cartoons against Lincoln during our civil war, he is not held in loving memory by most Americans of to-day, but he doubtless deserves his reputation as the greatest of all cartoonists.

A recent number of the weekly Living Age contains an article by Sir Robert Hart, for many years director of Chinese customs, on China and Reconstruction. He believes that the only possible solution for the present problem is to let China work out her own salvation. The Manchu dynasty may have outlived its usefulness, but the European powers must not ove turn it. The partition of the empire among the Powers is still more to be deprecated. There should be punishment for past crimes but not such punishment as will give to those punished the glory of martyrdom in the eyes of their countrymen. To insist upon completing the punishment before beginning negotiations for a permanent settlement is to cause unnecessary and dangerous delay. The return of the court to Pekin is a prime requisite for the restoration of normal conditions.

The Cosmopolitan for this month numbers among its contributors the following names which are well known in widely separated fields: Joel Chandler Harris, Harry Thurston Peck, Norman Hapgood, Mrs. Burton Harrison and Richard T. Ely. A curiously illustrated article on The Festival of Love gives the history of St. Valentine's day and its celebration.

The Delineator, being a magazine of fashions, comes out nearly a month before its date, so its March issue is about contemporary with the February number of the others. This gives the feminine reader a chance to get the March fashions from the March magazine and wear them in March. Those who have not seen the Delineator recently will need to be reminded that it has been much enlarged and improved.

It is scarcely ever possible to review a dictionary, or even a volume of a dictionary, but the Biblical World has reviews of several of the most important articles in Volume 3 of the Hastings' Bible Dictionary, by various recognized authorities. The dictionary represents for the most part the position of the moderate progressives in matters of biblical criticism. Professor Henry Preserved Smith quotes this summary of the article on Moses as an outline on which most modern scholars agree: (a) That Moses was the leader under whom Israel was delivered from bondage in Egypt and from peril of annihilation by the Red Sea, and was governed during its sojourn in the wilderness; (b) that through him Israel received a revelation which was a new departure in the national religion and the foundation of Judaism and Christianity; (c) that he originated or formulated many customs and institutions from which the later national system was developed; that thus (d) Israel owed to Moses its existence as a nation; and (e) Moses is a unique personality of supreme importance in Old Testament history.

Coffee Knocked Him.

Couldn't Move for 4 Hours After Drinking 2 Cups.

When coffee drinking affects a man's health so badly that he has to be put to bed for 4 hours after drinking 2 cups at dinner, it is high time he quit.

That was the experience of Mr. Hood, in Geneva, Mich. His wife writes: "I consider that Postum saved the life of my husband. For 2 years he had been troubled with his heart, and kept getting worse. I finally induced him to make the experiment of leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee, and he improved rapidly, but one day he drank two cups of strong coffee for dinner and had to lie on the bed for four hours before he could move, since that time no coffee is used, but Postum altogether. He has entirely recovered his health, has no more trouble with his heart, and says he likes Postum better than he ever did like the old-fashioned coffee.

"A number of our neighbors use Postum altogether to the exclusion of ordinary coffee. Once in a while I find a person who has tried Postum and does not like it, but always find, upon inquiry, that they tried to make it by boiling it 5 or 10 minutes, which absolutely will not do. It must be boiled 15 or 20 minutes after the boiling begins. Put in a little piece of butter to prevent it from boiling over, and you will have a delicious, palatable and nourishing beverage." Ada Hood, Geneva, Mich.

Convention, writes as follows to the churches in that county: "I desire to call you together in prayerful consultation for a spring and summer campaign. Hence I select Olive Hill as the place of meeting and Friday night, April 12, as the time for opening. The convention will continue over Saturday and Sunday. Please see that every church in the county is represented in this convention."

—The time has passed when we could consider that we had a monopoly on the idea of Christian union. A stronger or sounder plea for it could not be framed than that uttered in a recent sermon by Dr. Coyle, of the Central Presbyterian Church of Denver, as printed in the Denver Republican.

—Fred V. Loos, of Liberty, Mo., has been appointed by Gov. Dockery as a member of the State Board of Charities and Corrections for a term of six years. Bro. Loos is a prominent Democrat as well as a prominent preacher. He seconded the nomination of the governor at the Kansas City Convention.

—A Pan-American Bible Study Congress is to be held in Buffalo July 17-31, in connection with the Pan-American Exposition. It will be an interdenominational as well as an international gathering and will consider all phases of the subject. Arrangements are now being made by which we will have strong men to represent us on the program.

—Here is the record of a vigorous old age which is hard to beat: One of our subscribers, who is eighty-six years old, subscribes for and reads four of our weekly religious papers, the Missionary Tidings and two weekly secular papers—"besides odd papers and magazines." She reads her Bible through twice a year, "helps do housework and sews considerably." It is not stated what she does with her spare time.

—R. L. McHatton, now at Santa Cruz, Cal., will return east within three weeks and will make Kansas City his headquarters until a suitable pastorate opens. Meanwhile he will conduct protracted meetings wherever called. Bro. McHatton will have no difficulty in finding a place. During his years on the western coast he has not been forgotten in the east, and his tour of the central and eastern states last year had something of the character of a triumphal procession.

—The friends who visit Macatawa Park in the summer will be glad to learn that the Holland and Chicago Line announces a new steel passenger steamer which is to be 240 feet long and will sleep 200 people and have a guaranteed speed of 18 miles per hour to run between Chicago and Holland the coming season. It is said to be the finest propeller in the service to the east shore of Lake Michigan. This will run in connection with the "Soo City," the two making double daily sailings every day of the week from July 1 to September 1. The tri-weekly service commences April 1.

—"Nelson A. McConnell is dead. Will write later.—J. M. Rudy." This word, which comes to us at the last moment before our forms close, will bring a shock to many as it did to us. Bro. McConnell was foremost among the pioneers of our cause in Iowa. He knew the history of our beginnings there as scarcely any man now living knows them. It had recently been suggested that a history of our churches in Iowa ought to be compiled while Bro. McConnell and a few of the other veterans remained as sources of the history. The plan ought still to be pushed forward. We shall have more to say of Bro. McConnell when we learn the particulars of his death.

What are Humors?

They are vitiated or morbid fluids coursing the veins and affecting the tissues. They are commonly due to defective digestion but sometimes inherited.

How do they manifest themselves?

In many forms of cutaneous eruption, salt rheum or eczema, pimples and boils, and in weakness, languor and general debility.

How are they expelled? By

Hood's Sarsaparilla

which also builds up the system that has suffered from them.

It is the best of all medicines for all humors.

—Senator Stubblefield has introduced an anti-cigarette bill in the Illinois Legislature at the request of the Christian Citizenship League and it has been referred to the proper committee. We suggest that our Illinois readers stir up their state senators and representatives and urge its enactment. It should be designated as "Stubblefield Anti-cigarette Bill No. 97 in Labor and Manufactures Committee." The bill is a duplicate of the Tennessee law which has recently been confirmed by the Tennessse Supreme Court and by the United States Supreme Court.

—The question is being raised as to whether Christian Scientists shall be eligible to membership in fraternal insurance organizations. The Illinois Royal Arcanum Record suggests it as a problem which will soon have to be dealt with. When a man refuses medical treatment for pnuemonia or blood poisoning and dies, shall the company pay his insurance or rule him out under the suicide clause. The societies have no objection to Christian Science as a religion, but they cannot be blamed if they decide that it increases the risk of insurance.

—The Omaha papers contained full and flattering reports of the stag social held last week at the North Side Christian Church in that city under the management of W. T. Hilton. Over one hundred men sat about the table and it is credibly reported that the banquet was such that jokes about the meagerness of church suppers will henceforth not pass current in Omaha. Many speeches were made, all upon some phase of the subject, Men in the Twentieth Century.

—Bro. Meigs tells us that his recent appeal for a printing press and other equipment for Nankin Christian College did not meet with a hearty response. F. O. Fannon, of St. Louis, will take the matter up and try to get some of the brethren to invest in the enterprise. It is a great opportunity to do a unique and valuable work, to get in on the ground floor of the printing and publishing business in Nankin, and establish the first Christian newspaper in the great southern capital.

—F. L. Moffett, pastor Christian Church, Centerville, Ia., desires a copy of the statement once written by James A. Garfield, entitled "What We Believe" for the benefit of an inquiring friend. It has been published in our papers and any one having a copy in a scrap-book or otherwise, who will send Brother Moffett a copy, will oblige him.

—During January the Board of Church Extension received $1,713.03; churches, $143; individuals, $569.10; annuities, $1,000. This is a loss compared with last January, of $1,383.68. At the meeting of the Board, Feb. 5, the following loans were granted: Mobile, Ala., $4,000; Greenville, N. C., $1,000; Water Valley, Miss., $1,000; Scott's Bluff, Neb., $150; Ridge Farm, Ill., $700; Ceres, O. T., $300; Lorain, O., $2,000; Huntsville, Tex., $500; Ocean View, Del., $500; Redlands, Cal., $1,000; Collinwood, O., $3,000.

—A letter from Benjamin L. Smith, Corresponding Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, announces that his mother recently passed away to her final home. She lived with her son, Albert M. Smith, at Upper Sandusky, O., where she died on Jan. 29, at the age of seventy-six years. Her death was rather unexpected, as she was not especially ill. The transition from earth to heaven of such a life is well expressed by Brother Smith's little daughter: "Grandma fell asleep on earth and awoke in heaven." Blessed be the memory of our sainted mothers who have gone on before us and who will be among the first to greet us on the "far-off shore."

—Butler College has within the last few weeks received a gift of several thousand dollars from Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Thompson, for the erection of a memorial library in commemoration of their daughter, Miss Bona Thompson, of the class of 1897, who died two years ago. The building will be constructed of limestone and will probably cost about $30,000. The present college library contains about 10,000 volumes, by far the greater part of which are carefully selected recent books. There are few college libraries that have a smaller per cent. of accumulated rubbish and a larger portion of live and usable material. Mr. Thompson's generous gift has already stimulated considerable interest in the further enlargement of the library and a fund will be raised for that purpose.

—The following is the program for the Foreign Missionary Rally to be held at the First Christian Church, 11th and Locust St., Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 20, 10 A. M., Praise Service, C, M. Sharp. Address, Prayer and Missions, R. Lin Cave; The Preacher's Duty in Missions, E. B. Redd. 2 P. M. Address, Go or Send, J. H. Hardin; How Take the Offering, A. J. White; The Missionary Century, W. F. Richardson. Conference. 7:45 P. M. Song Service. Missions of the Twentieth Century—one or two strong addresses—speakers to be assigned. F. L. Bowen, G. H. Combs, O. P. Shrout, Committe on Program. Brethren throughout the state are cordially invited to attend. Visitors remaining over night will be entertained in the homes of brethren in the city.

—The religious census which was taken recently in Buffalo, N. Y., was a remarkable event. The plan was to have volunteer workers from all religious bodies visit every home in Buffalo within five hours on one day, Jan. 26. The plan was carried out with almost complete success and a valuable body of statistics gathered. The total number of Protestant church members in the city is 35,879; of Catholics 25,998. The Lutherans are the most numerous of Protestant bodies, followed closely by Methodist Episcopal and Protestant Episcopal. The Disciples of Christ are ninth on the list numerically. Forty-three denominations are represented, five of which have only one member each and six others have less than ten. Only fourteen persons in the whole city profess themselves infidels. The number of those who expressed no religious preference was surprisingly small and it was noticeable that the number of those who did express marked preference for one church or another was much greater than the number of those who habitually attend church in Buffalo, leaving a numerous company who have preferences but stay at home. The taking of the census was especially remarkable as a work of active Christian cooperation.

—William Remfry Hunt is back at Chu Cheo, Central China, after some months at Shanghai during the stormy times. He writes: "Peace is in the air. The wreckage of missions has been terrible. We came back to Central China under special permit from the Viceroy and with escort."

—L. L. Carpenter on Feb. 3 dedicated a new church in a new town. Stroah, Ind., is a town of several hundred inhabitants which has come into existence within the last two years. J. K. Hester, county evangelist of the adjoining county, was the first preacher on the ground and not a sermon has ever been preached in the town up to date, except by our preachers. One of the citizens gave a good piece of ground, and a church worth $2,500 has been erected. C. S. Medbury, of Angola, preached on dedication day, and in spite of the fact that no church has yet been organized and that there are only two or three Disciples in the town, more than $600 was raised. Bro. Hester has been employed to preach half time and a church will soon be organized. So far as we know this is our first case of dedication before organization.

—Bro. McLean writes as follows:

Referring to the statement of B. B. Tyler relating to the report of the Ecumenical Missionary Conference, I have to say that the price now is one dollar and a half, net, and postage, or one dollar and eighty-six cents. This is a marvel of cheapness. There are two large handsome volumes. Any publisher can supply those needing it.

Referring to the statement of S. T. Willis relating to the addresses at the Eighth Conference of Missionary Secretaries, I have to say that that report is not off the press. Those wishing it can address W. Henry Grant, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City. While I am always willing to serve the brethren I cannot get these works for any less than any one else. There is no advantage in writing to me, as the Foreign Society does not handle books. A. McLEAN.

—The Christian Tribune Home for Working Girls at Baltimore, Md., has just issued its first annual report. This statement taken from the report will show the purpose of the home:

Any working girl, irrespective of her denominational affiliation, between the ages of fifteen and twenty-five, whose parents are not living in Baltimore city and whose wages are not over $5.00 a week, may be admitted into this Home on the presentation of two letters of recommendation. Board must be paid weekly and five per cent. of the amount, that is, ten cents out of $2.00, which is the amount paid weekly—is placed in the savings bank to the credit of the payer. No account is opened until the accumulation has reached $1.00. The account is opened in her name and she is encouraged to add, as her wages may allow, to this accumulation, and when she leaves the money is absolutely her own. In this way we hope to teach valuable essons of economy and frugality.

Vital Statistics Show an Alarming Increase in an Already Prevailing Disease—Are Any Exempt?

At no time in the history of disease has there been such an alarming increase in the number of cases of any particular malady as in that of kidney and bladder troubles now preying upon the people of this country.

To-day we see a relative, a friend or an acquaintance apparently well, and in a few days we may be grieved to learn of their serious illness or sudden death, caused by that fatal type of kidney trouble—Bright's disease.

Kidney trouble often becomes advanced into acute stages before the afflicted is aware of its presence; that is why we read of so many sudden deaths of prominent business and professional men, physicians and others. They have neglected to stop the leak in time.

While scientists are puzzling their brains to find out the cause, each individual can, by a little precaution, avoid the chances of contracting dreaded and dangerous kidney trouble, or eradicate it completely from their system if already afflicted. Many precious lives might have been, and many more can yet be saved, by paying attention to the kidneys.

All who have any symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble should write to-day, mentioning the generous offer made in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a free sample bottle of Swamp-Root, the celebrated specific which is having such a great demand and remarkable success in the cure of the most distressing kidney and bladder troubles. With the sample bottle of Swamp-Root will also be sent free a pamphlet and treatise of valuable information.

Some Ohio Notes.

Am pleased to say that I am gradually gaining better health. Hence, will be able to do supply work. On Lord's day, Jan. 27th, conducted services at Hicksville, O. Bro. G. W. Speer is their pastor. Church is large and in a healthfully growing condition. They possess a fine church building. My visit was most pleasant. Bro. Speer, their minister, was at Mansfield, O., helping to hold a series of meetings, where, we have learned, scores of souls turned to the Lord. I attended the services of the Northwest Ohio Ministerial Association held at Toledo, O., Feb. 4th. It was well attended, and full of interest. Bro. C. W. Huffer, of Toledo, delivered a discourse on the Ten Virgins, and Bro. J. R. Ewers, of Bowling Green, O., read a paper on "The Preacher in His Study," both of which were followed with discussion. The whole was interesting and profitable. It afforded an opportunity of pleasant fellowship. Here we formed the acquaintance of a number of our ministers. Church work in our city is moving along nicely. I am to speak next Lord's day at Beavertown, O., and the day following at Eagleville, O. R. H. BOLTON.

Missouri Mission Notes.

At a recent meeting of the Kansas City Ministers' Association, Brother T. P. Haley called attention to the recently published list of Missouri preachers, and the large number of new names it contained, and suggested that the State Board take steps to secure the attendance of these men, in fact all the preachers in the state, at the next State Convention. The resolution was carried, and the State Board took up the matter at its last meeting, and measures are being considered with that end in view. Meantime we ask the preachers themselves to take the matter in hand and determine that they will let nothing hinder them from this gathering next September. I cannot think of a suggestion that has come to us with the promise of larger things in it than this. The new men in the state need to get acquainted with the old ones and the old ones need to become acquainted with the new.

Some very important measures were adopted at the last meeting of the board other than the one mentioned above. Bro. E. J. Lampton was employed as state evangelist and will work principally on the north side of the river. Bro. Popplewell was employed as evangelist in the Southeast District. Bro. Horace Sibnell was engaged for Cape Girardeau, Charleston and vicinity, and Bro. J. J. Limerick was employed as evangelist in Osage county. This is nearly all enlargement over the work of last year and calls for a much greater expenditure of funds, because we already have taken up other fields which were not touched last year at all.

This shows that the board believed the convention meant what it said, when at Moberly it said "enlarge." Now the real question comes, will the churches furnish the means? It were useless, indeed positively shameful, for the convention to urge the board to this forward movement and then refuse to furnish the sinews of war. Neither do we believe that we shall have this complaint to make. Churches are responding, the January collection is coming in. We have heard from Mt. Gilead, (Clay), Hopkins, Lawson, Beulah, Hopewell, Richland, Mo. City, Liberty, (Randolph), Savannah, Hackbury Mission, Bloomfield, (Stoddard), Cold Water, Bluff City, Bowling Green, Humphreys, First Church, Springfield, Second Church, (St. L.), Sixth and Prospect, Rothville, Excelsior Springs, Salem, (Platte), Baury, Antioch, (Clay), Houston, Clarksville, Rising Sun, Montgomery City, Walker, Grant City, Fourth Church, (St. L.), New Point, Poplar Bluff, Lakenan, Louisiana, Hartville, Frankford, Auxvasse, Schell City, Benton City, Bethany, Steffinsville, New Boston, Platte City, Newcomer, Cowgill, Prairie City, Stanbury, E. 15 Street, (K. C.), Brunswick, Pierce City, Fifth Church, (St. L.), Union, (Franklin), Liberty, (Clay), Tuxedo, Huntsville, Paris, Blackburn, Salisbury.

Many others have sent word that the collection was taken and would be sent in a little while, but I am sure there are many preachers who are reading this who have not yet presented this work to their churches. We need your help. We cannot any longer afford to do great things in a small way. I ask you then at the very first suitable time to bring state work to the attention of your people and under them to give all they possibly can.

Virginia Notes.

W. H. Book is now in a meeting with W. G. Johnson, of Wilson, N. C. Johnson is a Virginia man, a native of Craig county, which is the Virginia hotbed of preachers.

R. E. Lee Abbott has returned to his home in Craig county. He has not fully made up his mind yet to take the Crewe work. A good case of la grippe has him and he thinks it not likely that he will return. This work will pay $500 and they want a man at once to take up the work. Who will say I?

J. Preston Lewis has resigned the work in Petersburg and moved his family to Disputanta on a farm. We hope Bro. Lewis will continue to preach, and that he will plant the cause in this mission field. He made many sacrifices at Petersburg and the cause was strengthened by his untiring efforts.

The following pulpits are now vacant in the Old Dominion; Crewe, Petersburg, Newport News, Norfolk, Fredericksburg, Gordansville, Charlottesville, Marshall St., Richmond, Third Church, Richmond, and Spray, N. C., which is in the Virginia work. We need more harvesters. Wytheville, Va., is a good field and wants a man. Bluefield, W. Va., is asking for a man to come and take up that work. Virginia is the ripest field on the eastern coast, "Come over and help us" is our cry The Southeastern District, T. W. Moore, secretary, Crewe, Va., is hunting for a man to take up evangelistic work there. They have the money in the bank ready to support him in this work. Lynchburg is taking steps in the right direction. A lot has been bought and a building fund started. It received its first impetus from the offerings made in connection with the celebration of the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of the pastor, F. F. Bullard.

Let more of us have a wedding and start a church fund.

An Extract from Her Letter.

"If you could only be here this winter morning and see for yourself you would no longer doubt me. Roses are blooming in our front yard and all nature is as far advanced in this lovely American summer-land as it will be in your cold eastern home by June.

"We made the journey from Omaha to the Golden Gate on the Union Pacific to avoid the circuitous routes—an important item in the winter. An Ohioan in New England.

Portland, Me., is a noted and historic place. It is known by Portland cement. Here was the home of the great and gifted Neal Dow. It was close by the sea in this city that Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was born. His old home on Congress street and the place of his nativity near the sea still stands. Tom Reed, the famous "czar" of Congress, abides in this municipality. Portland itself is a beautiful city. It is a city of churches. It is claimed that a larger per cent. of the people go to church on Sunday in Portland than in any other New England city. Up there they have a real live Prohibition sheriff. HE prohibits, too. There is not a single saloon in the city of 51,000 souls. How long, O Lord, how long, must the rest of us put up with the iniquitous traffic?

Another thing of interest to me in Portland was the congregation of Disciples meeting on West Congress street. They number about fifty souls. They have a neat but small home. But whenever an organ goes into that little home the property reverts to the original owner, the donor. It is useless to enlarge on the history and usefulness of this church. That article in their creed that says "thou shalt not have an organ or join a missionary society" has so limited this little band that its influence does not go very far. What a pity that they who could stand for such a grand potential plea in a positive way, should stultify their influence by standing on negative ground. 'Tis true, 'tis pity; and pity 'tis, 'tis true.

At Williston church in Portland is the birthplace of Christian Endeavor. That was twenty years ago. Jan. 31-Feb. 3rd was given to the celebration of the vigesimal birthday of Christian Endeavor. It was a great meeting. It was good to be there. Four hundred people came up from different parts of the land to join the Portlanders in this demonstration.

There were hoary-headed college presidents, venerable bishops, noted preachers, state presidents from Maine to Missouri, and young men and maidens not a few. The trustees of the United Society held an all-day session on Thursday, Jan. 31. Never did a body of men of such varied religious opinions and temperaments come together in a more fraternal and Christian spirit. There was quite a divergence of opinion on matters discussed, but there was great charity that endureth long and is kind. There was much prayer. Hereafter the international convention will be held biennially. On the alternate years the state and district conventions will be greatly strengthened. The work in foreign parts was discussed. A man has already been called to India as general secretary. There is a crying need for one in China. The speeches of this gathering were of a high order. They all sounded the true sentiment. They honored and upheld the word of God. The Christ was supreme in every utterance. There was no mincing of words in declaring allegiance to the King of kings. In all things he was given the pre-eminence. The tablet placed over the door of Williston church on Saturday afternoon is of bronze. In length it is about five feet by about three feet high, and weighs 1,500 pounds. On it are these words:

IN CONNECTION WITH THIS CHURCH, REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, AT THAT TIME ITS PASTOR, ESTABLISHED ON FEBRUARY SECOND, 1881, THE FIRST SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR. FROM THIS SPOT THE SOCIETY HAS SPREAD WITH MARVELOUS RAPIDITY UNDER THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD, AND NOW BLESSES THE CHURCH IN EVERY LAND. CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS OF AMERICA, EUROPE, AFRICA, ASIA, AND AUSTRALIA, ON THE TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE SOCIETY, FEBRUARY SECOND, 1901, HAVE JOINED TO ERECT THIS TABLET, IN HONOR OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, AND IN LOYALTY TO THEIR MOTTO, "FOR CHRIST AND THE CHURCH."

John Willis Baer unveiled the tablet by pulling from over it the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack. In his presentation speech he said, "Christian Endeavor stands in open hostility to sectarianism, Sabbath desecration and the saloon, and I put them all together." In the speech of acceptance, Smith Baker, pastor of Williston church said, "Williston church and Christian Endeavor stand for regeneration and not development." This meeting will be a great impetus to the movement. The Disciples of Christ preached Christian union for three-quarters of a century but it remained for Christian Endeavor to publish it so everybody should know about it. We as a people ought to heartily endorse it for it is helping us to perform our mission as no other force is.

Francis E. Clark is a great man. His humility is beautiful and refreshing. At no time is he so much embarrassed and confused as when his praises are spoken. In his speech, he has done nothing; God has wrought it all.

What a field New England is! How little we have there as a people! Only 20 churches in this territory! Only five of these self-sustaining! Ten are without pastors! Thirteen preachers have resigned and left the field the past year! It is not an easy field. Where is such? It appeals to the heroic. We have volunteers who go to China and India. Why not some volunteers for New England? They need good preachers who are stickers. J. H. Mohorter is doing grandly at Boston. The audiences are fine. New people of influence are hearing. They are adding to the saved. The finances are kept in a most excellent condition. Bro. M. has gone to stay. J. L. Garvin has just gone to Swampscott. Bro. Picton is at Everett and doing well. Bro. Reinl is at Brocton. But these four, and no more, constitute the Massachusetts ministry among the Disciples of Christ.

It seems to me the A. C. M. S. ought to put the very best evangelistic team we have got into New England for five years. It would be the best seed sowing that could possibly be done. May the Lord raise up the men and put it into the hearts of the people to support them.

The Buckeye commonwealth is now greatly stirred up over the Cincinnati prize-fight. The governor has interfered. When this is in print we will either be humiliated by the spectacle or rejoicing that righteousness has triumphed. We predict the latter. The other morning in Buffalo a fellow from Cincinnati was cursing Ohio's governor and said, "Everybody in Cincinnati is in favor of the fight." What do Harvuot, Green, Foster, Fillmore, Lord, et al, say to that? Are you guilty, brethren?

F. M. Green is writing the history of Hiram College through the week and preaching at Stow on Sundays. The work is nearly done and will soon be in the printer's hands. It will be a volume of 400 to 500 pages and will sell at about $1.50. Hiram has a history that deserves a reading. It is also making history these days, too.

Ohio Disciples are preparing for the March offering for Foreign Missions. We expect to do better this year than we have ever done before. Now is the time for your big sermons on missions.

Ohio is having some great meetings. Wilson and Huston at Dayton with 273 at last word. Huffer at Bowling Green with about 50. Bates at Newark over 40. Speer at Mansfield with 50. Updike and Webb at Canton with over 100. Mitchell at Lima with 125. Let the good work go on. The writer goes to McArthur for a three weeks' meeting Feb. 11. Lilian Pearl Perrin will do the solo work. J. Walter Wilson, of Indiana, will sing for Franklin Ave., Columbus, beginning March 10. M. E. Chatley, of Carnegie, Pa., will spend a week, beginning March 3, with the Fourth Ave. Church, Columbus.

Kansas Saloons.

A REPLY.

We are in Kansas, not Missouri. In Kansas intoxicating liquors have no value. In Missouri they are of value same as sugar and coffee in Kansas. In Kansas all places where intoxicating liquors are sold and where people congregate to drink them are common nuisances and all liquors, bottles, glasses, pictures, signs, screens, tables, chairs, counters, etc., kept for the purpose of maintaining such nuisances, after conviction are to be publicly destroyed.

A man who goes into court to seek redress of his wrongs or fancied wrongs, must go with clean hands. Can a man do that who keeps a nuisance, or sells intoxicating liquors contrary to law? Our constitution declares that "Intoxicating liquors shall not be sold except for medical, mechanical and scientific purposes," and for these excepted purposes a druggist's permit must be had from the probate judge. In the large towns and cities in Kansas the law is openly violated. City officers license them the same as in rum-soaked Missouri. County and state officers violate their sworn duty by permitting them to run openly. They roll perjury under their tongues as sweet morsels. They not only permit saloons and dives to run night and day but protect them in their nefarious business. In Wichita about 400 prostitutes pay a monthly license of five dollars, from 50 to 100 houses of ill fame pay a license, from 40 to 60 saloons are licensed and as many gambling houses, and all these vile places of sin receive police protection. You cannot beg, coax or hire an officer to prosecute for any of these crimes, but woe be to the man or woman who interferes with their abominable business, and this has been the case for years. It is the home of Governor Stanley, who told me out of his own mouth that he could do nothing. The constitution says, "The supreme power of the state shall be vested in a governor who shall see that the laws are executed." And yet he fails, neglects and refuses to do so.

These being indisputable facts, if a person cannot destroy and abate these nuisances before conviction the people must submit to them forever. The persons who destroy these liquors, etc., are doing so to prevent crime. If I see a man in Wichita shooting at another, I grab the revolver and dash it to pieces I would be arrested for destroying property, but the shootist would go scot free.

There is not a saloon-keeper in Kansas who read your article in the EVANGELIST but rejoiced over the words of comfort published by the leading journal of a great religious body. You are giving aid and comfort to law breakers; I hope unintentionally, but you are doing it just the same. The old common law said, a person need not wait for the slow and tedious process of the law to abate a nuisance, but could do so himself. Newspapers and a few supposed religious journals prate long and loud against law breakers, but say nothing against the saloon anarchist who violates all law and obeys none. May God enable us to see the right and then do it, is my prayer.

DAVID NATION.

Medicine Lodge, Kansas.

[That the legal status of the liquor business is different in Missouri and Kansas is true. No one (except the Kansas police) denies the criminality of the Kansas saloon-keepers. The question is as to the legal status of Mrs. Nation. The point which we insist upon is that, when the constitution guarantees to every person that he shall not be deprived of life or property without due process of law, it makes no exception of criminals. The statement that "a man who goes into court to seek redress must go with clean hands" has only this much truth: That any person of unclean hands who does go into court to prove another's wrong-doing must take his chances of having his own crime brought to light. For this reason the Kansas saloon-keepers will not prosecute. But this fact has no bearing upon the legality or illegality of Mrs. Nation's act. There is such a thing as a crime against a criminal, even though the injured criminal may not be willing to prosecute for fear of further exposing his criminality. This is exactly the way the case now stands between Mrs. Nation and the saloon-keepers.

We heartily second all that our correspondent says about the cowardice, duplicity, mendacity and venality of the officials who systematically neglect to execute the laws of the state. There has been no dispute on that point.

If the saloon-keepers of Kansas found joy and comfort in our original paragraph on this subject, in which they were compared with the vile criminal at Leavenworth, a murderer and worse, we ought not to begrudge them that crumb of comfort. Most people are not so easily pleased as our correspondent thinks the saloon-keepers are. We are glad not to be among the "few supposed religious journals" which "prate long and loud against law-breakers, but say nothing against the saloon anarchist who violates all law and obeys none." Against the latter we have said much and shall say more.

And now, the conclusion of the whole matter, so far as we are concerned, is this: There can be no rational argument to prove that the destruction of a man's property without due process of law is other than an illegal act. But, there are times when an illegal act is justifiable. The world's history shows many such occasions. The American Revolution was an illegal act. English history is sown with illegal acts which helped the progress of the nation. If this is anarchy let us make the most of it. It is a fact. But a grave responsibility rests upon every one who commits such an act. An illegal act can be justified only by a successful and beneficent result, not by a benevolent but futile purpose. Is this the Jesuit doctrine that the end justifies the means? Then let us make the most of that, too. There is this much truth in it: that while an act may be condemned for its own immoral quality, no act can find justification as a means except in its end.

An act, though illegal, may, we say, be justifiable under certain conditions. The question is, does this act of Mrs. Nation's come under that class? Here is a question upon which there can be rational argument. Our own opinion is that it does not, because it seems to us foredoomed to futility. If there were a reasonable prospect that it would be a death-blow to the saloons of Kansas, or of one town in Kansas, we would approve it as an act justifiable though illegal. Mrs. Nation's friends have weakened their case by a multitude of transparently fallacious arguments and a mass of irrelevant eloquence applied to the proof of the proposition that her hatchet-crusade was a law-abiding performance, and they have talked loosely about "the right of confiscation" and "contraband of war." In reality they do not care a rap whether her action was legal or not. They believe it was right and have tried to argue from its righteousness to its legality. What they should have done is to argue that it is justifiable, although illegal.

Before approving such an extraordinary action there are three questions which must be answered affirmatively: Is there a desperate condition to be remedied? Are the ordinary legal means inadequate? Will the contemplated illegal act produce the desired result? To the first of these questions all answer, YES; to the second, YES, unless something is done to get the machinery of the law in the hands of honest men; to the third, No. There can be little argument on the first two points. As to the third, it represents our firm conviction, but the record of the events of the next year or two in Kansas will be worth more than any argument.—EDITOR.]

NOT HEREDITARY

In the main, consumption is not hereditary; it is infectious.

Low vital force is hereditary; which gives consumption its chance. An infection starts it.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Two interested young ladies seem to lead at Macon City, and all are hoping soon to have a minister to take active oversight of the cause. Our rally was most successful. Miss Ruth Williams is one of the secretaries who does anything toward the end in hand, while Mrs. M. S. Carter works as usual where she is assigned. With S. G. Clay I had a very cordial reception into the home of our mutual friends, the Carter and Williams families, and the offering of the friends was liberal.

One of the best Home Department reports of the new century comes from Miss Maud Wharton, Stanberry, average collection of the month 17 cents, while two of their best teachers enlisted through this department, also superintendent of both Endeavor Societies, and the department has increased its membership one-half.

W. S. St. Clair is one of the "country" preachers whose Bible-schools go right along and he is now on his eighth year at Olivet, Boone, and seventh at Lydia, Callaway.

J. J. Limerick has just organized the school again at Mint Hill, and while doing good work at other points, has his heart on running this school to 75 by spring.

Wheeling is one of the great little schools, doing the work I have so often suggested to others. Fine class of young men, the most liberal in the school and apt in their recitation. The new statistics give them 65, but their books show 100, while their teaching results in constant additions to Christ, due largely to H. F. Ritz, their devoted minister. Their liberality to our cause is abundant and constant.

J. P. Myers is at a mission in Pike, Stark, and you will hear of a new school in the spring, the outcome of his zealous work in that interest.

Mrs. Fannie M. Achauer is superintendent at Mooresville. The work is succeeding and the school very promptly meeting its apportionment.

R. B. Caldwell reports for Monticello that all things point to a most successful year, the school taking on new life with its new officers.

Prof. Megee, who is doing such efficient work in the public school of Knox City, is a fine teacher in the Bible-school and his work is telling for good, as many of his south Missouri friends will be glad to learn.

$600 for $1.00.

A Profitable Investment.

Jno. Blakely, of W. Lebanon, Pa., reports that he got more value from $1.00 worth of Grape-Nuts food than from $600 spent in noted hospitals, trying to get well from stomach trouble. He says: "After all my experience, I had to come home thinking there was no cure for me. I was so weak and nervous I could hardly walk, and for three years I hadn't a good night's sleep. I was run down until I only weighed 120 pounds.

"I commenced using Grape-Nuts about a year ago and now I weigh 163 pounds and can do as good a day's work as any one. When I go to bed I sleep all night peacefully and am refreshed in the morning. I use Grape-Nuts food every day and know it is the greatest blessing that ever was sent to suffering humanity. I believe if it had not been for this food I would have been under the sod before this." There is a reason. No food in existence contains, in a concentrated form, the elements that will rebuild the nerve centers and the brain, as Grape-Nuts, and the beauty of the food is that it is perfectly cooked at the factory and by the process of manufacture is predigested in a natural way, therefore requires but trifling power of the stomach to digest it.

Book Notes.

We have for sale one set of the "Library of the World's Best Literature," edited by Charles Dudley Warner. This set contains forty-five large, handsome, cloth-bound volumes. The editor of this work, with a corps of assistants, selected the best from the writings of the world's greatest authors, and has thus brought together, in convenient form, all that is most worth reading of modern literature. The work is literally a library in itself. We have but the one set. It has been placed in our hands for sale by a gentleman who purchased it six months ago, paying seventy-five dollars for it. For certain reasons, he desires to dispose of it, and authorizes us to offer it for forty dollars. This is a magnificent bargain. For some time past a copy of this work has occupied a place in the office library of the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and has proved to be very useful and of great value. The price, $40, may be paid in installments, if desired. Remember, we have but the one set to dispose of, and the first to come will be the only one served.

E. M. Sefton has prepared and had printed a "Bible Students' Chart"—a chart outlining the Bible, stating concisely, concerning each book of the Bible, the date of authorship, where written, why written and of whom written. The several divisions of the Bible are clearly indicated. We regard this chart as a most valuable "help" for all students of the Bible. Sunday-schools and Christian Endeavor Societies should have this chart conspicuously displayed at all times. The chart folds into handsome morocco covers, resembling, when closed, a book. We will send this chart, prepaid, for one dollar.

Not in years has there been issued a book more valuable for young people than W. J. Russell's new book, just issued from our press—What Is Your Life? There are a great many books giving advice and admonition to the young, but the most of these are written in such a style that no normal, healthy young person is likely to read the admirable precepts therein contained. But Mr. Russell has happily succeeded in avoiding the didactic style. His book is bright, sparkling and interesting. He resorts freely to quotation and illustration. The boy or girl, young man or young woman whom you wish to turn from frivolity, petty vice, or thoughtless squandering of time and talents, will read this book, where they would decline to read most books written with a similar purpose. What Is Your Life is a handsome volume of 316 pages, cloth-bound, sent postpaid for $1.00.

Let it be remembered that we have not announced our adoption of the installment plan as a permanent feature of our book business. We may make it permanent, or we may withdraw it at any time. If you intend to avail yourself of the benefit of this plan, you would do well to write us at once. Otherwise you may be too late. Those who have availed themselves of the time payment privilege express surprise at the liberality of our terms. We enable responsible parties to purchase valuable books and pay for them in such a way the purchase-money is not missed.

Christian Science Dissected retains the popularity which it has enjoyed since it was first issued. We believe there is in existence no more effective weapon against "Christian Science" than this book. It is sharp, incisive and severe at times, but never abusive. There are many ridiculous things about the claims of Mrs. Eddy and her followers, and these things the author, who is somewhat of a humorist, has not failed to find. Therefore, though the book is, in the main, a most serious and sober examination and condemnation of "Christian Science," the reader will find a number of hearty laughs in its pages. Th price is but 25 cents.

A Symposium on the Holy Spirit is the title of a neat, cloth-bound volume of 155 pages, the joint work of Alexander Campbell, A. B. Jones, G. W. Longan, Thos. Munnell and J. Z. Taylor. The price has lately been reduced to 30 cents, postpaid.

We urge our patrons and all the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to remember that the Christian Publishing Company will send you, postpaid, on receipt of regular price, any book in print, wherever it may be published. If there is any book you wish, whether it be theology, science, history, fiction, biography or educational, send us your order.

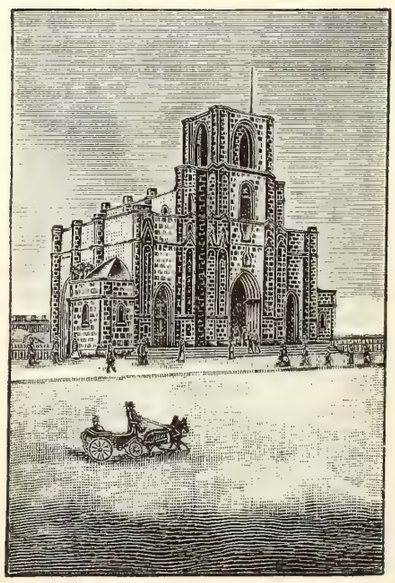
What Shall We Eat

To Keep Healthy and Strong?

A healthy appetite and common sense are excellent guides to follow in matters of diet, and a mixed diet of grains, fruits and meats is undoubtedly the best, in spite of the claims made by vegetarians and food cranks generally.

As compared with grains and vegetables, meat furnishes the most nutriment in a highly concentrated form and is digested and assimilated more quickly than vegetables or grains.



Dr. Julius Remusson on this subject says: Nervous persons, people run down in health and of low vitality should eat plenty of meat. If the digestion is too feeble at first it may be easily strengthened by the regular use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal. Two of these excellent tablets taken after dinner will digest several thousand grains of meat, eggs or other animal food in three or four hours, while the malt diastase also contained in Stuart's Tablets causes the perfect digestion of starchy foods, like potatoes, bread, etc., and no matter how weak the stomach may be, no trouble will be experienced if a regular practice is made of using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets because they supply the pepsin and diastase so necessary to perfect digestion, and any form of indigestion and stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach will be overcome by their daily use.

That large class of people who come under the head of nervous dyspeptics should eat plenty of meat and insure its complete digestion by the systematic use of a safe, harmless digestive medicine like Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets composed of the natural digestive principles, peptones and diastase, which actually perform the work of digestion and give the abused stomach a chance to rest and to furnish the body and brain with the necessary nutriment. Cheap cathartic medicines masquerading under the name of dyspepsia cures are useless for relief or cure of indigestion because they have absolutely no effect upon the actual digestion of food.

Dyspepsia in all its forms is simply a failure of the stomach to digest food and the sensible way to solve the riddle and cure the indigestion is to make daily use at meal time of a safe preparation which is endorsed by the medical profession and known to contain active digestive principles, and all this can truly be said of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

All druggists throughout the United States, Canada and Great Britain sell them at the uniform price of fifty cents for full treatment.

Columbus, O.—Annual report of Central Church for 1900, R. W. Abberley, minister: Money raised for all purposes, $2,675. For missions, $275. Accessions to local church, 72. Bro. Abberley held two protracted meetings outside during the year with 112 added. Many improvements have been made to the interior of the house of worship. The church is flourishing and outlook very hopeful. In co-operation with the other churches, a local extension board has been organized for city mission work and a fourth church of Christ is expected soon to be organized in the Buckeye capital.

Harrison, O , Feb. 5.—My relation with this church terminated with 1900, but I continued to supply for them through January. Jan. 27 we had one baptism. It was the last service I expect to enjoy with the church I have served over four years The condition of my eyes has made it necessary for me to engage in secular business, but shall continue to preach as I have opportunity.—R. G. WHITE.

Mansfield, O., Feb. 4.—Grant W. Speer, of Hicksville, O., has just closed with us a three weeks and four days' meeting with 60 additions. Bro. Speer is an excellent preacher and pastor.—L. G. BATMAN, pastor.

Shreve, O.—The church began the year 1900 over $600 in debt. They raised over $1,960 for all purposes, $350 being for missions. They closed the year without debt. L. W. Spayd, formerly of Michigan, was the pastor the last 10 months of the year. In January of the present year he held a meeting with the church. The additions were 22; 17 by primary obedience, three by letter, two by renewal. On February 10 he begins a meeting with the church at Forest Hill, Mich.

Warren, O.—Bro. W. T. Moore was with us three weeks, preaching every day. The wide reputation he has as editor, educator and lecturer made it quite certain that we should hear many good things from him. In spite of the fact that he is well on in the sixties he preached with all the vigor and earnestness and warmth of a man of 25. Not only so, but he put into his sermon-lectures so much of the strength of his ripe scholarship and wide observation and experience of travel that his preaching most profoundly stirred and inspired his audiences. Though there were few accessions, 16 in all, still we all felt that his gospel preaching, his exposition of so much Scripture teaching, hitherto hard to understand, had reconfirmed so many Disciples in their faith that we regard the meeting as one of the best ever held here. In primitive times it was found necessary that the strongest and best of preachers should visit the churches to re-establish them in their faith. "Paul returned again to Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, confirming the souls of the Disciples and exhorting them to continue in the faith." (Acts 14:21,22.) "And he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches." (Acts 15:41.) There are few, if any, young men equal to such a task. Paul with all his equipments did not undertake this until he was growing old. Our churches need such confirmation, and the men to do it are men of age, of long study and wide experience like Dr. Moore. I have been impressed with this thought never more than during our meeting. So often did I think, as I listened to Bro. Moore so ably expounding the Scripture and so convincingly driving his arguments into the minds and hearts of the people, that if he could only be utilized for this very thing, what a help it would be to our cause. I know this is a work that would be delightful to him if he could only arrange for it. No man is more capable or better fitted for it. I presume his place in the college at Columbia, Mo., will require most of his time there; but some of his time is at his own disposal and might be arranged for and any church or churches who can secure the doctor for such work should make haste to do it. I am writing out of my own deep conviction and not to advertise Dr. Moore. Our brotherhood will make a most serious mistake if it permits the wisdom and knowledge and experience which age gives to its ministry to be lost. I love the young preachers and no one is more willing than I am to reach out a helping hand to them, but I am sure that there is room and work for both old and young.—J. M. VAN HORN.

Perkins, Okla., Feb. 6.—We have just closed a protracted meeting at this place; 23 were added to the church, nine by baptism and 14 otherwise. The church is doing well here. Financially we have been a little pressed, but have met all obligations up to the present.—J. W. GARNER.

Scranton, Pa., Feb. 5.—Our meeting at the Dunmore Church was begun Jan. 6, and closed Feb 3, with Bro. A. P. Cobb, of Decatur, Ill., as evangelist; 37 by confession and baptism and one from the Episcopalian Church. This is the third meeting Bro. Cobb has held for the Dunmore Church in three successive years and by far the best. His sermons were decidedly strong. There has been a great deal of sickness among those interested in our cause here, yet in the face of the direct opposition of the Methodist Church we had excellent audiences most of the time; 28 were grown people, 15 the heads of families. The church has been greatly strengthened. Our work is in excellent condition now and our prospects for the future brighter than ever before.—J. D. DABNEY, pastor.

Amarillo, Texas, Feb. 3.—The Amarillo church is prospering. In fact everything is prospering out here in the Panhandle. I have been here five months; additions 25 in the regular work. The church is out of debt and raised my salary $15 per month, beginning Jan. 1. We will endeavor to give to all the departments of our mission work this year—including fund for old preachers.—VOLNEY JOHNSON, pastor.

Elma, Wash.—One added from the Presbyterians Sunday evening. We are making a crusade to save souls.—DANIEL TRUNDLE.

Palouse, Wash., Feb. 6.—Just closed a three weeks' meeting. Three by confession and five by letter.—E. C. WIGMORE.

Stolen—A Heart.

Alackaday! alackaday!
Somebody's stolen my heart away!
Not over-tall or under-size,
With hair gold yellow and azure eyes;
She smiled on me with a blush like dawn,
And my heart was missing when she was gone!

Alackaday! alackaday!
How can I live with no heart—oh, say?
She looked as pure as the stars above,
As true as the mate of a brooding dove.
How should I know that a thief I saw—
A thief who'd laugh at the name of law?

Alackaday! alackaday!
If hearts were sold in the mart to-day
I'd buy a heart like the one I lost,
And never grumble at what it cost;
But now, alas! I must bow the knee
And beg my heart be returned to me.

Alackaday! alackaday!
O charming thief on the world's highway!
I'll punish you well, if I but can,
For stealing the heart of a bachelor man!
As usury, when I ask for mine,
You may give your heart to—A Valentine.

"Reuben" in Antwerp, Belgium.

By Morton H. Pemberton.

When we were told in New York City that our steamer would land at Antwerp, Belgium, we supposed that we would find a little village on the ocean's bank with a few planks to step off on. How great was our surprise to find a magnificent city of 300,000 inhabitants—the largest and most beautiful in Belgium, with the exception of Brussels, its capital. How ignorant are people of each other! Up to this date I did not know enough of Belgium to want to see it. Antwerp as a little dot on the geography was all that I knew of it. I did not know whether its people were big or little, white or black, ignorant or wise. On the other hand, I don't believe there is a man in the whole city who has ever heard of St. Louis, Mo., or even seen it on the map. And yet people in both places are healthy, and some from both places will go to heaven.

Again, how great was our surprise when so many people told us that Antwerp was one of the most interesting cities in Europe. We found it so interesting that we remained two days.

Antwerp is an old city. Eight centuries before Christopher Columbus thought of being born people in Antwerp were building houses and steamboats. When Christopher Columbus was sailing westward to establish a republic in America, Antwerp was shipping furs and selling codfish. It has always been and is yet a thriving commercial city. But its shipping of coonskins and its commerce was not so interesting to me as its historical landmarks and other things wonderful to behold.

The first thing which strikes one in Antwerp is the appearance of the people. I supposed the people in Antwerp would be small in stature and not very good-looking; but instead they are the best-looking people up-to-date that I have seen. The men are large, strong and vigorous, and have the most beautiful complexions. My wife was so charmed with the good looks of the men that she says when she is left a widow she intends to locate here in Antwerp. As for the women, they are not so well dressed and not so good-looking as the men. They are pretty enough, but an American would not trade his wife for one without considerable boot. The ladies wear no hats on their heads, no matter how cold it is; and the men all smoke and keep fat on German beer. The fact is, if you did not know you were in a European city, you would think you were in a first-class American city. They look just like Americans until they begin to talk; and then they sound like monkeys and you feel like a fool. They all speak the French language, or their own language, the Flemish—anything but English.

Here in Antwerp is the finest and the third largest cathedral in the world. They began to build this cathedral in 1352 and they built on it for the next three centuries. It is 402 feet high and you have to go up 616 steps to get to the top of it; and when you get up there you don't feel as comfortable and as near heaven as you did at the bottom. It covers several acres of ground and has a capacity for 65,000 people. Its carvings in wood and stone, its decorations and its paintings make one open his mouth in wonder and feel that a few smart people have been born before this generation. Here in this cathedral is the "Descent from the Cross," the masterpiece of the great painter, Rubens. Here also hangs in a glass case on its walls another of Rubens' most famous paintings, "The Scourging of Christ," and the doors covering this picture are only opened on Sunday morning. Nothing could be more lifelike. One feels that the Christ is about to be struck again by the brutal hands of those who did not understand him. The silent worshiper who looks up at this picture and then sees in his priest a representative of the loving Savior who suffered here for him, has a better soul when he leaves his sacred place of prayer and devotion.

As we had never seen a Catholic service in a large church or cathedral, we went Sunday morning to see how people in a cathedral like this would worship God. Several thousand people were in attendance and there was a continual stream of people coming in and going out during the entire service. The first thing one could hear was the big choir of several hundred voices, with a full orchestral attachment. Their pipe-organ is as big as an ordinary church, and its orchestra makes you feel that you are in a theater, until you get further in and see that the men are all sitting on the back rows. People who are opposed to instrumental music would have to get out of the way in this big church to make room for the fiddle and the bass drum. The music was grand and as free as salvation. Its grand tones almost opened up heaven before one's eyes, and gave him a glimpse of his golden harp. If any good brother who is opposed to instruments in church could hear such music he would never refuse to resurrect when Gabriel blows his horn because he was opposed to instrumental music here on earth.

At the other end of the cathedral were the altars and about forty priests conducting the services. Three different sets of priests were conducting exercises in different parts of the cathedral. Their chants and songs were of course in the Latin language, and as difficult to understand as an American solo singer in English. If you did not know that you were in a house of worship you would think that the illumination of the altars was a preparation for a Fourth of July celebration. It was beautiful and grand and sublime, and the service was very impressive. Every few moments little bells would ring and jingle. I asked a man what it meant. He explained, but it was in the Flemish language and I could only understand from what he said that it had something to do with driving away the devil. I suppose they ring off the devil in this country just like we ring off the telephone in America.
